In adapting stereoscopic relief to moving pictures, it is imperative that the first principles of the subject as we have here briefly outlined them must be closely followed, otherwise success is a physical impossibility. However taken or projected there must be shown on the screen two pictures of the one object or scene taken from different points of view, the distance apart of the latter being, roughly, that of the distance between the human eyes. All authorities on binocular vision from the days of Euclid, Leonardo Da Vinci, down to Sir David Brewster, the most eminent writer on the subject, are agreed on this fundamental principle, in which practice entirely supports them.

The second condition essential to success is, that the unaided vision alone is not sufficient to enable the brain to produce on the mind the sensation of stereoscopic effect on the screen, consequently some sort of eye piece, ocular, viewing glass or spectacles must be employed. The eyes cannot do this themselves. The left eye must only see the left hand picture on the screen; the right eye must only see the right hand picture. There must be no confusion between the two. This latter condition inevitably arises without the use of some such device as we have outlined.

Attempts to overcome this difficulty are numerous. One of the commonest of devices is the repeated presentation to the eyes of alternating left and right hand pictures; an ingenious idea, but no good in practice. Attempts have been made, and, in fact, are being made at this moment, to devise some sort of screen or curtain which in itself by careful contrast of light and shadow shall give a picture projected upon it the effect of roundness of relief. This is also clever in inception, but practically useless.

Cameras for taking stereoscopic moving pictures are fairly common. One, indeed, was described in a contemporary only last month. It uses two lenses instead of one. The taking of the pictures, as any intelligent photographer knows, is a simple matter. Their projection is merely a matter of careful optical and mechanical adjustment. The whole crux of the matter lies in the viewing end of the business. Just as it does in ordinary stationary stereoscopic photography in which a stereoscope is essential to the proper realization of the effect of relief or solidity.

We think it well that attention should be once more directed to the real difficulty of producing stereoscopic moving pictures. A great deal of misconception on the subject is prevalent, to which we may possibly recur on a future occasion.

Superior critics in the press are denying moving pictures the possession of any pictorial merit whatsoever. The charge is so sweeping that it can only proceed from writers who never look at moving pictures or at any rate do not keep track of the rapid progress that is being made in their qualities. We shall deal with this subject in detail on another occasion, meanwhile, some of the work of the Edison's, such as the "Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run," and many of the Kalem, Pathe and Biograph films are, as it is commonly said, "as pretty as pictures"; in other words, in composition, lighting, sentiment and treatment, they comply with the principal canons of pictorialism. And the masterpieces of the world's greatest workers in monochrome can do no more than this.

CHAPTER XI.

Photographing Outdoor Subjects.

At the conclusion of last week's article I promised that hand coloring and other branches of my subject would form the theme of another article. This I will remit to a future date, now that outdoor work is becoming prominent. It must always be remembered that besides the regular film manufacturers there are a large number of moving picture photographers who use their cameras for a variety of purposes. It is chiefly the needs of these that I have in mind this week. Hitherto this series of articles has treated on the making of the picture in the studio. Nothing has been said about outdoor work. This is a field wherein the moving picture camera finds very great use. The time of year is quite appropriate for inserting in this series some information upon the uses of moving picture cameras for taking outdoor subjects. Recently a movement on the part of the film manufacturers to facilitate the exhibition of topical subjects has been made. This should induce a larger production of topical incidents and occurrences than has hitherto characterized the industry in this country. They should be very popular as special features for moving picture theaters. Let me illustrate what I mean: In March last the Inauguration of President Taft, at Washington, was exceedingly well received wherever it was shown. Here you have a typical topic of the day. In like manner consider the popularity of Wilbur Wright's Aeroplane. True, this picture was made in France. For the purposes of my argument, let us suppose it was made in this country. The conclusion to be drawn from the fact would, I think, strike the reader as being just as strong.

So let us have topical subjects as much as possible and then a step will have been taken to prevent the Summer slump in the business; for we never tire of news. In England the moving picture supplements the daily newspaper. It is true that America is a country of magnificent distances, but this should not interfere with the supply of the demand which I think exists for films illustrating the chief events of the day as they occur.

For the information of American readers who are unfamiliar with the state of things in England, let me explain how it is that in that country the topical picture is such a valuable item in the moving picture situation. Great Britain, that is England and Scotland, though it contains about 40,000,000 people, about one-half the population of the United States, is a very small place. From end to end it is about 800 miles; at its widest part about 300. My American friends are constantly telling me that it could be comfortably tucked away in a corner of the great State of Texas. No doubt, but judged by density of population, it leaves Texas well behind. In moving picture work, as in many other things on this earth, it is the number of people appealed to that counts.

London, the greatest city in the world, is situated in the southeast corner of England. It is only a few hours from Paris and continental Europe. On the southern coast of England, Portsmouth, the greatest naval arsenal in the world, is situated. Within a few hours of London are the Royal Palaces, great military centers, race tracks, yachting grounds, athletic grounds, crowded rivers, scenes of pageantry in public life, and the great cities of Liverpool, Birmingham and Manchester, Leeds, Edinburgh and Glasgow in which there is always "something doing." Indeed, scarcely an hour of the day passes in which there is not something of national importance taking place within a few hours of London. Now, all this renders it comparatively easy for the enterprising moving picture maker to make his exposures, develop the negatives and positives on the train and show his pictures in the London music halls the same evening. I can assure the readers of the World that these pictures are enormously popular and form permanent features of the programmes. Now is it not feasible, taking New York as a typical city, for the moving picture man to photograph base ball games, yachting in the bay, racing at Brighton, incidents at Coney, the ocean liners and other subjects within a radius, let us say, of 200 miles from New York and show his pictures at the vaudeville and moving picture theaters the same evening? There are possibly reasons why this class of work is not cultivated, but at any rate the suggestion occurs to me as worthy of consideration.

To attempt to tell the user of a moving picture camera how it is to be handled for outdoor work in all circumstances that arise, would be foolish of me. The uses of the camera outdoors are so manifold that in the present series of articles I can only deal with the subject in a general way. At some future date I will deal with particular classes of work.

By outdoor subjects I mean those which are not specially rehearsed as in the dramatic pictures that are so popular just now. Take for example a procession, a street scene, or an athletic contest. Point of view is everything. The man behind the camera should have some eye for effect. He should not plant the instrument down at any haphazardous point. It is necessary for him to know something about the elements which go to make up a picture. The people should not be too near the camera, or they will look unnaturally large on the screen. Again the right time of day should, if possible, be chosen. Midday, with the sun at the zenith, that is, when the sun is exactly overhead, is not the best time of day, for the reason that the picture is not illuminated to give the best effect of relief and contrast. Afternoon is the most suitable time, for then the shadows lengthen and the lighting is more harmonious. On the other hand, morning is a very good time: then the atmosphere is clear. The dust has not been stirred up. Then again, unless the operator has a mastery of pictorial effect, he should adopt a conventional method of lighting. That is to say, the sun should be behind the camera, either to the left or to the right and not in front of the camera.

Again, the camera should always be level and a finder should be used. Moreover, if the operator is wise he can be looking one way and photographing the other. This will prevent people looking into the camera; in other words, he will get a natural scene. The charm of moving pictures of outdoor subjects, such as a crowd, is the unconscious naturalness of the people. Of course, this applies to street scenes and crowds generally.

I will resume this theme next week. All I have attempted to do this week is to give the reader, first of all a few rough ideas on the uses to which the moving picture camera can be put in outdoor work, and secondly a number of hints to keep in mind when actually turning the handle. In all this, as in the foregoing, I assume a certain amount of knowledge and intelligence.

ERRATA.

The announcement on page 630 of last week's issue that the Progressive Motion Picture Company, of Ogden, Utah, had been licensed as producers was incorrect. Their application is on file for an exchange license only.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

SWITCHES.

Those attempting to pass an examination will find it quite essential to know considerable about switches, especially the correct names of those in most common use. To this end illustrations of some of them are incorporated. Fig. 6 shows a single throw, double pole knife switch such as is almost invariably used for light circuit service switches, also for the projection arc lamp circuit. This is the switch most commonly encountered, but it comes in many forms. The "snap" switches which are enclosed in a small, round metal case and operate with a button are one form of this switch. A, Fig. 6, is arranged for link (A, Fig. 10) and B for cartridge (Fig. 9) fuses. Fig. 7, A, shows the triple pole, single throw knife switch; Fig. 7, B, the single pole, single throw knife switch, and Fig. 7, C, the double pole, double throw knife switch. Fig. 7, A, is arranged to carry cartridge fuses (Fig. 9), while Fig. 7, B and C, must have link fuses (A, Fig. 10) or plain fuse wire.

Where a switch is made with two sets of contacts, as in C, Fig. 7, so that it may be thrown clear over making another contact on the other side, it is called a "double-throw" switch; otherwise it is a "single-throw."

Taking A, Fig. 6, as an example: the wires attach to binding posts 1-2-3-4, being intended, in this case, to be soldered into the lugs (called "Terminals") shown. These lugs are by no means necessary, however, as the wires may be attached directly to the switch binding posts. C-C are the switch "contacts." The fuses attach between binding posts a-a and B-B, this swtich requiring the use of link fuses (A, Fig. 10) or plain fuse wire. B, Fig. 6, is arranged for cartridge fuses, such as are shown in Fig. 9. A, Fig. 7, shows cartridge fuses in place.

Switches should invariably be mounted on slate, porcelain or other insulating base, slate being the most common material for this purpose. It is important that contacts C-C, Fig. 6, be kept clean and smooth. They will, where strong current is used, become roughened in course of time, due to arcing them when the switch is opened. This may be smoothed off with a fine file, but if the contacts are charged at the time you must stand on an insulating mat or a wooden chair while doing it and avoid touching both contacts at once, or anything which will ground you, or you will get a shock. Live wires may be handled with impunity provided you are completely insulated from the ground and don't touch both wires at the same time.

A dry wooden chair insulates you for ordinary voltages. An asbestos, rubber or lineoleum mat does the same. There is no danger from an ordinary shock from lines charged up to 220 volts, though you can get a "jolt" that will make you take very decided notice. Also it is possible to get painfully burned by even that voltage, though such a thing is very unlikely to occur. The point I wish to make, however, is that you may touch and work with a "live" switch contact or wire when necessary by exercising care in keeping yourself insulated.

SWITCHES SHOULD INVARIABLY BE MOUNTED EITHER HORIZONTALLY OR SO THAT THE SWITCH HANDLE WILL HANG DOWNWARD WHEN THE SWITCH IS OPEN. This is of importance, since if mounted the other way there is always liability of the switch lever accidentally falling into place, thus closing the switch, which might you to get some unpleasant shocks, and even, under certain circumstances, do other and much worse damage. The fuse end of the switch (where the fuse is attached to the switch base) should always be the "dead" end. That is to say: binding posts, 1 and 2, Fig. 6, A, should be the "live" end, and not posts 3 and 4. The "live end" means the end attached to the supply, the other end being "dead" (not charged) when the switch is open. In the case of the operating room arc lamp switch the live end would be attached to the wires coming from the main house switchboard. In the main house switch it would be the end attached to the wires entering the building.

Contacts D-O, Fig. 6, must be kept as tight as may be without unduly binding the action of the switch. Unless these contacts are kept snug they will heat more or less, moreover the switchbars will "wabble" and won't strike contacts C-C squarely when closing. Always keep the connections between the handle crossbar (E, Fig. 6) tight. A loose, wabbly switch indicates a sloppy workman. In purchasing switches LOOK CAREFULLY TO THE LAST NAMED CONNECTIONS. In some makes of switches this joint is very poorly made and causes constant trouble, particularly in the smaller switches.

INVARIABLY OPEN A SWITCH WITH A QUICK JERK, especially if it be one carrying heavy current. This reduces the arcing. Arcing roughens and injures the contacts and the less there is of it the better.

Triple pole switches are, of course, used only on the three-wire system. A switch enclosed in a casing of sheet metal is called an "enclosed switch."

SWITCHBOARDS.

It is not designed to go deeply into this subject, but merely to give you some ideas from which you will be able to trace out ordinary switchboard connections for yourself. In most theaters where there is a switchboard it will be found arranged about as Fig. 8, A or B.

A, Fig. 8, is a two-wire board, a-a being the feeding mains, b-b the fuses, c the main house switch and d-d-d-d-d-d-d-d-d-d the circuit service switches. The two rows of circles are the circuit fuses, being of the "plug" variety, (B, Fig. 10). Looking closely you will see screw heads in the face of the bars. These screws indicate the contacts, circuits being run in either direction from each contact. As to the two-wire board, I do not believe any explanation is necessary; but the three-wire board is more confusing, though it is quite simple after all. I have numbered the circuit contacts of this board (B, Fig. 8) 1-1, 2-2, 3-3, 4-4, 5-5. Now an examination shows us that circuits 1-1 have contacts with the right hand and neutral bars, as have also circuits 2-2, which means that these four circuits (there are two circuits to each contact, if all are working) are on one "side." Circuits 3-3 and 4-4, however, we find to have contact with the neutral and the left hand bar, which means that they are connected with the opposite side. Thus far, if the circuits are all working and have equal number of the same candle power lamps the board is equally "balanced." Circuits 5-5, however, we find to be connected to the neutral and the right hand bar so that there are three contacts with six circuits on one side and two contacts with four circuits on the other. COUNTING THE SCREW HEADS IN EITHER OUTSIDE BAR WILL TELL YOU THE NUMBER OF CONTACTS THERE ARE ON THAT SIDE. One side of ALL circuits are connected to the neutral (center) bar. To find which side a circuit is connected to disregard the screw heads in the center bar and find the screw connecting it to the outer bar. This will show you which side it is on. These two illustrations are given that you may study them closely. Large switchboards are very confusing, but as a matter of fact they are extremely simple. Remember that the light circuit running from a three-wire board HAS BUT TWO WIRES, NOT THREE. Remember, also, that a circuit can be, and usually is, run each way from a switchboard contact; in other words, each contact usually carries two separate and distinct circuits.

Pulling switch c kills the whole board, of course, and extinguishes every light it controls. Blowing a fuse on the two-wire board has the same effect, except that the wires will still be alive in the sense that a shock will be had if you touch them. Fuse-blowing on the three-wire board is more complicated, however. If one of the outer fuses blows the lights on the circuits connected to that side will go out, but those on the other will still burn. If the central (neutral) fuse blows out there will be no effect at all provided the board is evenly balanced—has an equal number of candle power on each side. This is by reason of the fact that under these conditions there is no current in the neutral wire at all, the lamps of the two sides burning in series with each other. If, however, there be a greater candle power on one side than on the other there is curent flowing in the neutral wire equal to the difference and if the neutral fuse blows the side having the greater candle power will burn dim until the fuse is reinstalled. This is the practical effect of the blowing of a neutral fuse since the even balancing of a three-wire system is seldom accomplished, though it might be balanced evenly enough on one board to show no perceptible effect through the blowing of a neutral fuse. The reasons for the installation of three-wire systems will be explained under "Wire Systems" further on.

The main house switchboard should invariably be mounted on slate, marble or other insulating, non-combustible material and the whole board should be enclosed in a metal cabinet with a door having a substantial, easily manipulated latch. If the board is of considerable size it should be placed in charge of some competent man and none other be allowed to touch it. The fuses of all circuits, except the stage, exit and operating room arc lamp circuits should be located on the main switchboard.

The proper place for the main house switchboard is the lobby, preferably at a point from whence a view of the stage, or curtain, may be had. The writer considers it exceedingly good practice to have the main switchboard equipped with two main switches, as follows: The main house switch which pulls everything except the exit lamps and a sub-main switch which pulls all lights it is desired to extinguish to darken the auditorium, with the exception of one circuit handled by the operator as afterward explained. Darkening the auditorium by pulling half a dozen circuits one after another makes a very bad effect. This switch should not prevent the installation of all the regular circuit switches but be supplemental to them. This applies to large houses only, where there are several auditorium circuits. On large switchboards it is well to label all switches plainly, indicating just what circuit they control, thus: "Proscenium," "Ceiling Clusters," etc., etc.

EXTRA LIGHT CIRCUITS.

In some cities it is required that extra lights be operated with non-explosive oil burned in suitable lamps. If electric light is allowed for exit lamps the circuit should in all cases be controlled from the box office, never from the main switchboard, and this circuit should in no case be controlled by the main house switch. There is no telling what a blanked fool will do when excited. He might pull the main house switch at an alarm of fire, thus throwing everything, including the exit lights, in darkness. Tap in your exit light circuit ahead of the main house switch (i. e., between the switch and the street mains) and run it directly to a switch located in the box office, where proper fuses should be installed. Thence run the service wires to the various exit lamps. Exit lamps should be enclosed in a box with ground glass front on which the word "EXIT" has been blocked out in translucent red, the letters not less than five inches in height. These signs should be placed over all exits and the lights in them be kept burning at all times when an audience occupies the auditorium.

It is desirable that one of the auditorium circuits, preferably the ceiling lights, be controlled from the operating room, as well as from the main switchboard. This is accomplished by running the circuit service wires from the main switchboard service switch through the operating room, bringing them past a position on the wall DIRECTLY IN FRONT OF THE OPERATOR and in easy reach from operating position. Install a sub-service switch so that the operator can reach both it and the dowser at the same time. Now when the signal is given the operator to start, all the circuits except that controlled by him are pulled from the main switchboard. The operator, when ready to start, pulls the above described switch with one hand as he pulls the dowser or starts the machine with the other. The effect is to darken the house and throw the picture at one and the same instant. In stopping the order is reversed and the picture is off and the lights on simultaneously. It is NOT advisable to have all circuits handled thus, since the man at the main switchboard should be able to light the auditorium instantly, in case of alarm, which he could not do were all circuits controlled by an operating room switch, until the operator threw in his switch. The main switchboard service switch of the circuit controlled by the operator is not touched at all—is left shut at all times except when the house is closed.

STAGE SWITCHBOARDS.

Stage switchboards should all be assembled at one point, preferably just to the right of the proscenium arch—the right as you face the auditorium from the stage—and mounted on insulating, non-combustible material. Each circuit must have its own service switch, as: "1st border," "2d border," "Foots," etc., etc., and each switch should be plainly labeled with the name of the circuit it controls. NOTHING BUT ENCLOSED FUSES SHOULD BE ALLOWED ON A STAGE UNDER ANY CIRCUMSTANCES. Plug fuses (B, Fig. 10) or cartridge fuses (Fig. 9) are proper fuses for stage use. Great care should be taken to have all binding-post contacts and wire joints tight to prevent any heating, and especial care must be had that the insulation of wires, switches, etc., is perfect.

Observations by Our Man-About-Town.

The switching of the fight against Sunday shows charging prices of admission, to Coney Island, is a source of both relief and gratification to the exhibitors in the boroughs comprising the remainder of the greater city. The persistent aggressiveness against them shown by the authorities has been a severe strain upon both their nervous system and pockets. It has been a serious question with them as to whether the authorities would carry the anti-Sunday show war into the Island, but now all doubt on that score has been brushed aside by the action taken there by the police on Sunday, May 16.

The city exhibitors claim that Coney Island is the best place on earth to have a decisive test of the Sunday shows. They say the city fellows have been battling all Winter and it is nothing more than fair that the seaside sports should bear a little of the testing business, and if Coney Island can beat out the authorities in court on the question at issue, the city exhibitors will have no fighting to do in the Fall, as the precedent will be a strong one.

In many quarters the situation at Coney Island is not taken very seriously. Some people who appear to keep in pretty good touch with actual conditions incline to the belief that the police activity on the first Sunday of the season was more in the nature of a play for moral effect. However that may be, all eyes are turned upon the Police Commissioner and his attitude on the second Sunday of the season regarding shows and exhibitions will be the keynote for a bunch of injunction suits that will keep the lawyers busy. Nearly all the moving picture shows on the Island charge no prices of admission. With very few exceptions the shows are given free, the proprietors depending upon the beer and other refreshments sold to spectators for revenue, so that these picture people are not in the same position as the city exhibitors, who charge admission fees. Nevertheless, the Island cry is the same that has been heard in the city for months past: "Sunday is the workingman's day for recreation and he should not be deprived of it." It is certainly strange that the charging of admission fees should bring places within the interpretation of the law as taken by the police authorities, and the places that give the pictures as a free lunch should be exempt. Commissioner Bingham is credited with the statement that he is really at sea regarding the law and the only thing for exhibitors interfered with to do is to get injunctions against the police and fight the thing out in the courts.

This statement of the Police Commissioner is worthy of more than passing notice. It is virtually a declaration that he has his orders and intends to obey them, but he points out a method by which the picture exhibitors and others can stop police interference for the time being, at least, and relieve him of the burden entailed by his duty.

This reference to injunction suits brings to mind the present position maintained by the legal fraternity as compared with the conditions last Fall, when injunction proceedings first became so prominently identified with the moving picture business. Scores of exhibitors found lawyers ready to get injunctions for them at twenty-five dollars each. The prices have since gone up and it is intimated that they will continue rising. It appears that the lawyers have concluded that injunctions are indispensable and the exhibitors who want to do business must have them, regardless of cost.

The legal fraternity will probably find they are mistaken on this score. It was hinted several weeks ago in these columns that the agitation against Sunday picture shows would gradually die out, and conditions to-day indicate a certainty of such a result. During the past three months there has been a striking change of sentiment in behalf of moving pictures. This change has been brought about in a great measure by the establishment of the Board of Censors. The supervision of film subjects by this organization has attracted the attention of people who would not attend the picture shows because they feared offense in some manner to either themselves or those they took with them. Thousands of these people are now regular patrons of the picture houses and are enthusiastic in their support of them. Of course, all credit is not due the Censors' Board. The supervision exercised with regard to cleanliness of places, means of entrance and exit, treatment of patrons, and other precautions has also largely contributed to the establishment of confidence in a source of amusement that seemed doomed by the policies of undesirable managements.

A gentleman who has just concluded a season on the road with a theatrical combination that embodied moving pictures in its program, declares that the pictures are now more popular than they have ever been and he can see no indication of a decline. "As far back as six years ago," said he "I was like many others. I looked for the pictures to become has-beens with the close of the season. I was then closing a vaudeville program with one reel of film. Almost every time I flashed the announcement slide I could see people in groups leave the house. During the tour I have just concluded I have visited houses I played with my one reel. These houses are now picture places and doing good business. Right here in New York I find houses in which the pictures were looked upon as a joke, packed to the doors. The pictures certainly have a strong hold on the people throughout the country and anybody who entertains views to the contrary is ignorant of the real situation."

Another party who has just come in off the road gives a good tip for exhibitors in search of novelties. In one of the Eastern States several enterprising exhibitors occasionally introduce what they call serial weeks. Once every two or three months they set aside one week for pictures based upon the works of certain well-known writers. For instance, they advertise "A Week with Dickens" and get their exchange to reserve all the pictures they can secure in that line. Another week there is a spectacular series and another "Past and Present Novels," "A Few Nights with Shakespeare," "A Week of Travel," etc. Judgment is required in such undertakings, or there may be falling off in business. No one show is given up entirely to the kind of pictures spoken of. Only one reel is used at each show and the subjects are changed daily. The balance of the show comprises the regular run of films. In other words, the specializing is done to create in old subjects an interest that would not be aroused if they were put on without the special announcement. The plan is reported as meeting with big success. It may be better understood by citing a plan adopted by a Massachusetts manager a few weeks ago. Each day he gave his first run subjects proper display on his billboards and at the same time reserved suitable space for the announcement, "Tragedians' Week—'Virginius' To-day." His third reel, which he sandwiched between the two advertised, was a commonplace one. The ingenious method of advertising proved a great hit. This same manager has already announced "A Week in Dixie," during which he will feature each day one of the many Civil War stories that have been told in pictures. He is also arranging to have a selection of Southern melodies played with each subject, this program also being changed daily.

This idea is one of the best heard of in some time in connection with the arrangement of nickelodeon programs. It is perfectly simple and inexpensive and creates an irresistible interest. Old subjects are resurrected with a refreshing color that makes them appear new, or makes the audience feel pleased to see the old faces again. The idea is also a stepping away from the monotonous "Everything New To-day."

A film renter, speaking of the matter, grew quite enthusiastic. "That's just what we want. I hope all exhibitors will see the point and grasp it. They will save themselves and the renters many sleepless nights in trying to get hold of some old films that have not been used in their places, when we haven't got new ones to supply them. New films can only be had with money, and exhibitors who cannot afford to pay the price cannot expect to get what those who can pay receive. The next best step is to adopt the specializing plan. It would not do to operate it week after week, as it would become monotonous and kill the novelty, but it is a great idea for occasional introduction.

OLIVER.

The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theaters.

By Wm. I. Sackheim.

I.

Advertising has become so general that it is needless to dwell upon the necessity of publicity in any line of business. But while all agree in this estimate of its value, few know how to apply it to their particular requirements.

Take, for example, moving pictures—a form of amusement that has earned the applause, respect and support of the general public. The strides this industry has made within the past few years have astonished the pleasure-loving world. It is not my purpose to go into discussion or history of the business. We know that the moving picture theater is here to stay, and it is up to the manager to attract the public to his house.

As the demand for this class of entertainment has grown, so has the supply of theaters increased. Competition has become so strong that the manager must be constantly on the qui vive in order to keep the public interested. Here is where the man with ideas, originality, push, energy and a knowledge of advertising forges to the front.

From time to time I may offer suggestions in this column on the general methods of advertising a moving picture theater. But what I wish to impress upon the moving picture theater owner now, is the necessity of a good front and artistic signs and posters. This is the most essential part of the theater.

With the exception of a few of the larger theaters in every town, which have secured the services of professional letterers, the front of the average nickelodeon resembles a meat market or cheap grocery store.

I have also discovered, through personal investigations, that the inferiority of the signs is not due to a deficiency of competent sign writers, but rather to the desire on the part of the exhibitor to save a few dollars each week.

Mr. Exhibitor, stop and think a moment. Your house may be beautifully decorated, your programme well selected, your help courteous, everything may be run in shipshape style, but it will avail you nothing if the public is not properly apprised of what is going on inside. You have to get the people inside by your exterior.

During the past ten years or so I have been obliged so often to answer that idiotic and silly argument, "Oh, any old sign will do, as long as the people can read it," that I will not offend you by insinuating that it is necessary to answer the argument here.

Take a walk through your streets and observe the signs of any moving picture theater. The color schemes are usually incongruous, the lettering amateurish and in many cases almost illegible.

If any kind of signs will do, why do the larger houses hire permanent sign writers by the week when some porter or usher could scrawl the announcements? If a small house can save two or three dollars a week on signs, a larger concern of, say, ten times the size, can naturally save twenty or thirty dollars per week by using cheap signs. This is plain arithmetic. But the answer is simple. As soon as a man's interests increase, his scope broadens in the same ratio.

In emulating the methods of successful business men, do not neglect the minutest detail. The public appreciates art. The first impression the passer-by receives is from the signs. They should be clear, neat and artistic, but devoid of "gingerbread," so that he who runs may read. The main thing to remember is, that the general effect is what counts.

If you cannot afford to hire a good letterer permanently, make some agreement with the best sign painter in your locality, whose reputation for artistic workmanship is without question. Arrange to have him do your work for a certain specified sum, and if he is fair minded and anxious to please, you will be the gainer. Don't haggle over a few dollars. Make it interesting for him to use his brains as well as his paints and brushes.

Above all take an interest in the work yourself and remember that a cheap man in any capacity is always the most expensive in the end.

New York Exhibitors and Their Political Power.

By Justinian.

"Confusion worse confounded" continues to be a phrase accurately describing the moving picture situation in New York City. The moving picture business might be cartooned as a donkey which the Mayor and his subordinates are driving, and every time the club descends on his ribs and a hollow sound and a groan issues from the donkey the city rises up and shouts, "See what a brave boy am I!" The latest blow fell last Sunday, when the police descended on Coney Island and shut up the shows. The Coney Island shows are licensed as "common shows," under the same title as moving picture shows, and a blow at one is a blow at the other.

Then the Mayor went off on a trip, but before leaving he ordered that no moving picture shows be licensed unless they agreed to stay closed on Sundays, and, furthermore, left the exhibitors in doubt whether they would not be closed by the police next Sunday, license or not.

So the persecution goes on. How many tens of thousands of dollars have been lost by New York exhibitors in the past year through this persecution? How much longer, if it lasts, can the business stand up under it? And when, oh when, will the New York exhibitors wake up to their political power and begin to use it?

New York has an Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors. What has this Association done? It has financed the Board of Censorship for one thing. This is a fine work, and the whole country has profited by it, as well as the New York exhibitors. What else has the Association of Exhibitors done? It has employed legal talent, has secured injunctions, and has fought the city, on the whole, successfully to date. The Mayor has been enjoined from revoking all moving picture licenses with one stroke of the pen. He has been enjoined from refusing seven-day licenses, but this will be carried to higher courts and, in any case, the Mayor is still refusing to grant seven-day licenses to common (moving picture) shows. This is well and good; the laws are abominable, unjust, impossible if the business is ever to become a staple business, and the Association of Exhibitors has done its best by legal means to keep the shows alive under these ruinous laws.

BUT WHAT HAS IT DONE TO GET BETTER LAWS?

This is the crux of the whole matter. What have the New York exhibitors, inside or outside the Association, done to get just laws, a system of licensing which will make persecution and graft IMPOSSIBLE? This situation is squarely up to the New York exhibitors, and now is a good time to make the situation clear. What is needed?

Moving picture shows are licensed as "common shows." The common show license was created by a city ordinance twenty years ago and was meant to license traveling shows, merry-go-rounds, etc., which were here to-day, there to-morrow, and the only way to license them was to give the License Bureau arbitrary power in the matter. Then Coney Island was established, and the city authorities saw their chance. They decided to license Coney Island shows as "common shows," which left them at the mercy of the politicians. Then moving picture shows came along, and they, too, were put under the common show license. As common shows they have what amounts to no rights at all. Look at this difference:

A saloon is licensed. When it conforms to certain written requirements, made to safeguard the public, a saloon is entitled to its license. If the license authorities try "hold up" methods, refuse the license or demand graft the saloon goes to the courts and gets its license by due process of law. If the licensing authorities want to revoke the license of a saloon or even of a theater (not a moving picture show), they must have cause—that is, they must prove before a court of law that the theater or saloon has broken some written law or regulation. The gist of the matter is, that the law recognizes a saloon or theater license as PROPERTY which cannot be taken away save for cause, and the cause must be adjudicated by the courts.

Now for the common show—the moving picture—license: First. What requirements must the applicant for a license fulfill in order to be entitled to his license? He tries to find this out, but he cannot. There are no laws on the subject and no regulations that have ever been published. If the applicant for a license has a bright mind, and does some detective work, he is able to learn what most of the requirements are, and he builds his place accordingly. Then he is likely to find that the requirements have been changed over night and all his expenses have gone for nothing. But even if the requirements have not been changed he may be "held up" by the License Bureau, and has virtually no redress in law.

Now he gets his license. Can he keep it? To-day a fire inspector comes along. "Do this, do that," he says. It is done. To-morrow comes along another inspector. "Why did you do this or that?" "The inspector told me to," replies the exhibitor. "Oh, g'wan," says the new inspector, "I'll register a complaint." He does this, and the license is revoked. Or perhaps he doesn't, and the license isn't revoked —for reasons.

In other words, whereas a theater or saloon license is property, a common show (moving picture) license is not property, but only a privilege. Yet on the basis of his common show license the exhibitor has invested thousands of dollars and assumed obligations of thousands more.

Now which is more important: to spend thousands of dollars fighting a losing fight in the courts to defeat the operation of such laws as these, or to go to work in an orderly manner and get the right laws? This is what the exhibitors in New York have not done. And unless they "get busy" in the near future there may not be enough exhibitors left to do anything.

Do they think that the situation above described is an accident? Not by a long shot, Brother Exhibitors. Do they think the city authorities are going to change the situation of their own free will? Are the city authorities yearning to give the moving picture shows the legal status and protection which is their right? Oh no, Brother Exhibitors. The Mayor and the city departments much prefer the present arrangements, and you don't need to be told why. And the theaters, and everybody else who is bent on putting the moving picture shows out of business, think the present arrangements are ideal. Seriously, since the New York exhibitors have done nothing to remedy this condition, it must be that they expect someone else to remedy it for them. It is high time for them to recognize that they themselves must get busy, or nobody else will.

Now, in about ten final words: The moving picture shows in New York City play to about two million people a week, and a third of these are voters. There is a gigantic political force in this, if only the New York exhibitors will use it. The municipal campaign is just beginning. Unless this license question is made a definite issue, and the candidates of both sides are pledged during the campaign, nothing will be done after the campaign. NOW OR NEVER the exhibitors must put their hand to the plow. What is the Association of Exhibitors going to do?

Notable Film of the Week.

"The Actor's Mother."

Late one night in the Seven Dials, London, which is the Bowery of that city, I saw a poor old woman standing helplessly against a lamppost. A well-dressed man stopped and offered the woman money. The sound of her voice evidently struck the man as familiar, as he started to question her. Her reply removed his doubts. I was the accidental witness of the last act of a real drama of real life. The poor old woman was the well-dressed man's mother. They had not met for years. I saw enough to enable me to fill in the previous acts for myself. I passed on my way with the reflection, that occurs to most of us at times, that truth is stranger than fiction, and that the incidents of real life are far more dramatic than those shown on the stage.

This reminiscence occurred to me as I sat the other day and followed the story of "The Actor's Mother," a Gaumont film released within the past week. The last act of this play is almost the exact counterpart of the incident in real life which I witnessed. Indeed, we have long had this incident in mind for the purpose of turning it to dramatic effect. The relationship of a mother and son does not often attract the pen of the dramatist. When it does, as in the present case, it tells a story that appeals to all hearts. For, of course, the love of a mother for her children is one of those things that passeth all understanding. It can never be analyzed, defined, explained or subjected to diagrammatic treatment like any other emotion. In our opinion, therefore, it is the story of 'The Actor's Mother" which makes it the notable film of the week, for it is a simple story, clear, dramatic, logical and natural, that makes a universal appeal. Consider for a moment: The stage-struck French peasant quits his old mother with all the money she possesses to make a name before the footlights. After he has gone, she is turned out of her home, because she has not the wherewithal to pay the rent. Then in a series of very naturally depicted scenes we are shown how the old woman drifts into beggary. We admire the reticence of the dramatist in not insisting too much upon this gruesome side of the story. We also admire the prettiness of the French scenic backgrounds against which the pathetic figure of the poor old lady is shown. Meanwhile the son has succeeded in his profession and has become a star actor. Quite by accident, the old lady runs across the theater outside which the playbill advertising her son is shown. She endeavors to gain access to the theater in order to see him, but is unsuccessful. Then she traces him to his home, where he has the society of gaily-dressed ladies, and she is still unsuccessful in meeting him. Finally she falls down exhausted in a public place, as the result of a push from her own prosperous looking son. Stooping down to raise her, he recognizes his own photograph which she holds. Discovery, reconciliation and forgiveness, of course, follow. There is nothing particularly new in this story, nothing particularly morbid, gruesome or heartrending. It is all simple, natural and unforced. If it conveys any lesson, it is simply that of the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother"; but it also serves another purpose in that it interests an audience, every individual of which is either a son or a daughter, and therefore had a mother. Whenever a dramatist appeals to the elemental emotions of humanity he is always successful in that appeal, provided he does it naturally, and that is what the Gaumont Company does in this picture.

From a photographic aspect the film is excellent, although we may be pardoned for pointing out that there might be more contrast in it. Gaumont pictures are inclined towards low tones and flatness. This sort of thing makes for artistic praise, perhaps, but the public likes accentuation between the lights and shadows, while it does not like excessive contrast. A happy mean is the thing to aim at. We are all the more pleased to single this film out for special mention because we have had occasion over and over again to adversely criticise the Gaumont films for their somewhat sad endings. Sad endings cannot, of course, be wholly eliminated, but we think they might be fewer. Life itself is made up of sunshine and shadows in about equal proportions, and film makers might keep this fact in mind when sending out their goods.

ANOTHER KEITH & PROCTOR HOUSE FOR PICTURES.

Keith & Proctor's 125th Street Theater, that has for years been the home of refined vaudeville, has been converted into a moving picture show, thus leaving only one of the K. & P. New York houses, the Fifth Avenue, showing vaudeville. The 125th Street Theater has been equipped with two of Power's latest model Cameragraphs.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The Eden Musee, on Twenty-third street, New York City, furnishes about as good an environment for the moving picture as one could wish. The Musee, as all the world knows, is a high class show place, situated in one of New York's most popular, prosperous and best frequented centers. It is the favorite haunt of Mrs. and Miss New York when in search of the daintiest things in clothes, and so there is always a floating clientele on hand to patronize the Musee; its wax groupings, its pictures, its music, its stereoscopic pictures, and other attractions. The moving pictures are shown in a large and spacious theater at stated hours of the day, and there is always a constant ebb and flow of good class audiences. The place is beautifully conducted, the attendants courteous and altogether the management may take credit for its administration of one of New York's high class and most refined places of entertainment. The Musee, moreover, boasts what is probably the largest moving picture screen in the city or elsewhere. I have never heard of a larger picture than 30 feet. That is the size of the Musee screen. There is a skilful operator, who knows how to show the pictures; the result, therefore, is satisfaction to the audience. The screen is placed somewhat high above the little stage, upon which an orchestra discourses sweet music, between the acts, so to speak. It might with advantage be lower, but I presume that there are difficulties; one of them may be the gallery, which runs round two sides of the hall.

On the occasion of my visit this week, I was entirely pleased by finding myself one of an audience of refined and interested lovers of the moving picture. Such an audience as any theater or opera house might be proud to have. This is as it should be. The Great Northern Company's "William Tell" and "Swiss Views" attracted great attention, and much interest was shown in the fine, sensational picture of "The Italian Cavalry," which has been shown these last few months in the chief cities of the United States. Indeed, the marvelous escapades of the cavalry men and their horses in this wonderful picture held the audience in a grip of excitement all through. The quality of the films shown was uniformly good throughout and found favor with the Musee patrons.

But what has the management of the Musee been about that it has not trumpeted forth in its loudest voice an attraction which should draw all New York to see and hear it? What have I done, Mr. Musee, that I, who am so much interested in this subject should only discover its existence by accident? Why have you treated me thus? Why have I not heard of this marvelous, this amazing Fotophone of yours before? For here in the Musee is a really splendid combination of the singing and moving picture with an absolutely perfect synchronism. You have a quartette and sextette of opera stars, such as Caruso, Scotti and Sembrich, standing before you like life, singing like life, moving like life, and looking like life, all due to a combination of perfectly synchronized photography, phonography, light, sound and movement. Picture it all with suitable musical accompaniment and you have probably the most convincing, realistic and astonishing illusion in New York City shyly hidden away in the Twenty-third street Musee. Why, this thing deserves to be featured in the very center of Broadway at Forty-second street! It has been said in these pages over and over again that the future of the moving picture is bound up with that of the phonograph; in other words, the pictures must apparently talk and sing as well as show movement. A necessary condition of this development is perfect synchronism. Well, you have them at the Eden Musee; besides that you see the finest possible pictures, as I have endeavored to tell the reader, and when to this you add the fact, which I venture to repeat, that you may sit at your ease in a handsome hall, listen to excellent music or look at the other marvels in the Musee, the visitor may comfort himself (or herself) with the assurance that he or she is having the best which the moving picture field can offer. I like the Musee, and I am sorry that I have not been there before, but now that accident has taken me there once, design will take me there many more times with my sisters, my cousins, my aunts—or somebody else's.

Spokane, Wash.—The Western Film Exchange has been incorporated with a capital stock of $25,000. The incorporators are L. W. Hutton, E. G. Sherman and others.

Atlanta, Ga.—Geo. B. Carter, formerly secretary of the Posey Amusement Company, has purchased the Elite Theater, at 36 Peachtree street, from that company and intends to add vaudeville with moving pictures.

"THE GIRL SPY."

War dramas are always popular when they are served up in a style that convinces; in other words, when the story and scenes leave the impression that it is not a fake and the spectator is so carried away by the realism that he forgets the medium by which the drama is presented. Several American producers have scored distinct hits in war dramas, and these, as a rule, have emphasized the heroism of the North when the Civil War was the theme. The Kalem Company, during their sojourn in Florida, disclosed many interesting traditions and incidents of Southern life, but none more thrilling than the story of "The Girl Spy," whose success in conveying the movements of the Union soldiers to the Confederate general so long baffled the Union officers. Although the bitterness of feeling between the North and South is happily a thing of the past, this prettily told incident of the war by the Kalem Company should be especially dear to Southern audiences, while it is of equal interest to the North, in that it is a faithful representation of an actual historical fact. During the whole reel there is not a moment of dullness; in fact, the interest is intense. The heroine does her part to perfection, and it is the opinion of those who have looked upon hundreds of moving picture plays that "The Girl Spy" is the most convincing military drama yet produced by the Kalem Company.

"THE INDIAN TRAILER."

The headliner attraction at Keith & Proctor's Bijou Dream on Wednesday night was a threadbare story of hatred, revenge by kidnapping and the untutored Indian in the role of rescuer. There were stronger and more finished productions on the programme, notably, "Pere Milon," a gruesome war story by Pathe, but no number elicited so loud and unwonted applause as "The Indian Trailer." For that reason it is a safe number to add to any programme, as we have observed its similar reception in another theater. Metropolitan audiences show great appreciation of pictures of this character and that of "The Bad Lands," Selig's Western picture of last week. The skilful horesmanship of the rough riders seems to be a welcome variation from the silly chases at 11 cents per, and in this film of "The Indian Trailer" the scenery and action is of the best. There are a few slips in the production that were overlooked or unnoticed by a critical audience. The route of the dog which carries the message to the bereaved father and the apparent readiness of the man who takes the message are points which rather weaken an otherwise thrilling production, but, on the whole, it is a film that is far above the average, and, as we said before, its power to interest the average audience was strikingly manifested.

THE THEATER UNIQUE.

This palace of motography on New York's moving picture mecca, Fourteenth street, has lately added a balcony which increases its large seating capacity by several hundred, and this was taxed to its limit when we dropped in one evening this week to see a special film of the Polar regions which was announced, but for some reason not shown. Still we had no reason to complain of the quality or length of the programme, and do not object to old films either, when such a good selection is made. In fact, in this instance, we were particularly thankful as it gave us the opportunity of seeing "The Cord of Life," an intensely dramatic Biograph film which we had missed on its release date in January. We owe a belated compliment to the Biograph folks for this natural and graphic representation of the life of the Italian, bringing out, as it does, in dramatic contrast the strong paternal affection, the domestic love and the jealous and revengeful character of the Sicilian. But for the Biograph trade mark we should have said this film was produced on the European Continent, as it shows some of the overdone action and grimaces which in some foreign films often appear monkeyish. This may have been a studied effect to lend color to the scenes, which are dramatic from start to finish. The interest rises to a high pitch when the revengeful Sicilian hangs a basket containing a real live baby out of a high window so that the basket will fall if the window is raised. The climax is reached when the father, after a mad race, dashes into the room and, lowering the upper sash, reaches down and saves the baby from almost certain death. A gasp of relief went up from the audience at the Unique and loud applause showed their appreciation of the film. Sandwiched in between the reels at this theater were a couple of vaudeville acts of greater merit than is usually seen in a moving picture theater.

A SOUTHERN RENTER.

Mr. R. A. Boone, of the Theater Film Service, Birmingham, Ala., visited us this week and in the course of a long and interesting interview, gave us some idea of the status of the moving picture in the South. The Theater Film Service does a large business in licensed pictures. The demand chiefly existing amongst exhibitors is for American productions and especially Biograph subjects, which are very popular in Alabama. Films dealing with foreign subjects are not very highly appreciated. There is, indeed, a strong demand for pictures with American themes. Mr. Boone says he finds no difficulty at all in regard to the license question. Like other bright men engaged in the film business, his outlook is distinctly an optimistic one. He sees no diminution in public interest in the moving picture. Store shows abound in Birmingham and vicinity and the song slide is popular. We were glad to meet Mr. Boone and to have evidence of the very intelligent way in which he handles his business. Many more such as he would contribute towards the prosperity of the industry.

CARL LAEMMLE TALKS TO US.

Interview with the Greatest Film Renter in the World.

"Carlsbad in a month and the London Crystal Palace Moving Picture Exhibition in July," said Mr. Laemmle to us as he took a seat in our office one morning this week, "that is my programme."

"Well," we rejoined, "tell us, Mr. Laemmle, your opinion of the outlook from your standpoint." And before our victim had time to reply we took occasion to compliment him upon the extreme pungency and cleverness of his advertisements, which elicited an appreciative smile on his well-advertised countenance.

"The business of Carl Laemmle," said the owner of it, "has increased 70 per cent. I find that my customers are very well pleased indeed with the International films, which are of very high quality. Foreign humor, however, is not quite understood by American audiences, and it would be a good thing if the plots and scenarios were furnished from this side of the Atlantic and made into moving picture by English film manufacturers.

"No; I am not going into the song slide business myself, but the music business I have recently undertaken has turned out far more successfully than I had expected. Indeed, my sales astonish even those who have been in the business much longer than myself. I am very well satisfied indeed with my relations with Mr. Murdock, who, in a wonderfully short space of time, has mastered many of the technical details of this business."

"What about your Summer business, Mr.. Laemmle?" we asked.

In reply Mr. Laemmle supplied us with figures which show that in the present month he is doing far more business than he was doing this time last year, and, moreover, that the normal decrease of business in June, July and August of last year, as compared with the other months of the year, is so slight as hardly to be worth notice. From all this, and from what else passed at this interview, we gathered that the outlook of Mr. Laemmle in the moving picture business is distinctly hopeful. Nay. more. We drew from him an impression which we find to be general, and is confirmatory of our own views, that the future of the moving picture is one we might say of almost limitless possibilities. Mr. Laemmle should know. He has his hand on the pulse of the business more tightly probably than any other man in the world.

He foreshadowed to us several plans which we are not at liberty to mention, which, when they are made public, will cause as much surprise as his recent public announcements. Moreover, they make, in our opinion, for his own success and the betterment of the moving picture.

There is no more alert mind in the moving picture field to-day than that of Carl Laemmle, upon whom we recommend all interested—and there are many thousands—to keep an eye. For Mr. Laemmle is very much alive, indeed, and has a keenness and breadth of mind which are valuable factors in the moving picture situation, and in themselves supply the best possible refutation of the rather absurd attacks of which he has recently been made the object.

Wm. H. Swanson & Co. have engaged as their special representative in the States of Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas that prominent film man, Chas. L. Young. Mr. Young left for Richmond recently and will start immediately an extensive campaign in the Swanson interest. Mr. Young is a "jolly good fellow" as well as being a prominent Mason, Elk and Eagle.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Readers of the criticism on last week's notable film of the week will observe that a point was made of the originality of the story, "The Hunter's Grief." Originality in this connection, of course, is a comparative and not an absolute term. Absolute originality in anything to-day is hard to find. A wise man, named Solomon, a few thousand year ago said that there was nothing new under the sun. Solomon knew a thing or two. He solved the affinity question for a time, as we all know. But that is another story.

Originality, or rather freshness, of subject is one of the features of Pathe's films. Seldom do you see one of their pictures which may be fairly classed as having a hackneyed story. If the story itself is not actually new, it is handled in a fresh manner. In short, it has originality of treatment. Consequently it is not necessary for a moving picture story to be absolutely new in order that its effect upon the minds of the audience may be that of freshness and originality. The whole question, in short, is one of clever dramatic treatment.

Many recently introduced films deal, I perceive, with very hackneyed themes. The writers of the stories are quite unfamiliar with the literature of fiction, and their work shows the prentice hand of the aspirant for literary fame. The people who choose these stories for moving picture film treatment are also incompetent critics. The result of all this is that just now the market is stocked with subjects of a certain kind, which, judged from a reasonably high standard, are foredoomed to failure.

Then again, even amongst the older firms, I perceive a tendency to plagiarism. It is apparently easier to convey than to invent. This is a pity. For if you cannot always invent, you, at least, can vary. There are only 56 notes of music on an ordinary piano, out of which a duffer can get a certain number of tunes. Consider, however, how tremendously the trained musician can improvise on one theme alone! So it is with painting, poetry, black and white work and other branches of art. The mind of the trained worker can always produce new fruit. In every instance it may not be of a masterly kind, but it is at least good and finished. In short, it is artistic.

Don't you think that all this applies to the writing of moving picture plays? Of course it does. Several weeks ago I pointed out that ten or twenty dollars would not buy a moving picture play. Some moving picture workers doubt my word, and have bought the good so-called stories at those prices or less. The results are being shown in moving picture theaters at this moment and their audiences are being disappointed. The demon of cheapness has started in to kill the early efforts of some of the new entrants into the moving picture field. The work is slobbed and slurred over, and money has been wasted on the one hand and stinted on the other.

Thomas Constable, the noted English landscape painter, once said that a good picture could be seen at a glance. Much the same applies to a good story on the moving picture screen. Come to think of it, good moving picture stories are scarce. Not that they are not written or offered for sale, but that those who set themselves up as picture story editors are not qualified to make the selection. This is a real evil, as any intelligent friend of the moving picture industry knows, and the sooner some of the new entrants into the moving picture field recognize it, the sooner will their films stand a chance of success in the open market.

A SHIPPING BOX.

While in Philadelphia we saw at the Eagle Film Exchange a very ingenious shipping box. The box is made of solid galvanized tin with a solid metal handle, and the inside is divided into two compartments: one for two or three reels and the other for slides. The advantage of this box is to insure perfect safety in the transmission of films. No more reasons for damaged films or slides, and at the same time is a great saver of time to the shipping clerks. As these boxes are made to last, their moderate cost is soon repaid in the saving of packing paper, twine, etc. Messrs. Jonas & Kane, two enterprising young men, of 1237 W. Columbia avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., are the manufacturers of this very convenient shipping box.

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

The Board of Censorship of Moving Pictures and the People's Institute gave a "model show" last Saturday morning in the Nickoland Theater, at 162d street and Third avenue.

Their idea was to show what the Board of Censorship had accomplished by gaining control, through the consent of the Association of Moving Picture Show Men, of all the moving pictures houses in the city, and what they aim to accomplish through this control.

The audience was made up of public school teachers mainly, with some others who were interested in the work.

The theater, instead of being dark as formerly, was light enough for the reading of a newspaper. This change, the Board of Censors believes, does away with one of the criticisms of the old theaters. In place of the cloth screen on which the pictures were projected an aluminum sheet was used which allowed the pictures to be shown in a lighted room.

In place of the old colored "illustrated" songs, which represented girls in blue dresses saying farewell to soldiers in khaki beside a moonlighted lake or in a rose garden, there were reproductions of classical statues, paintings, and architecture—the "Marble Fawn," the "Mona Lisa," and "St. Peter's," for example. But these, it was explained, are not intended entirely to take the place of the songs.

Many interesting films were shown, including several of a Biblical nature, in order to convince the audience that the moving picture was worthy of public esteem.

The audience seemed to enjoy the entertainment.

THE MARSHAW SLIDE CO.

Letters still come to us complaining of the tardiness of the Marshaw Slide Co., of Kansas City. The following is a sample:

"Aurora, Ill., April 10, 1909.

"The Moving Picture World:

"Gentlemen—On February 1, 1909, I sent in a small order for slides to the Marshaw Slide Mfg. Co., Kansas City, Mo. I sent a check covering amount of the order. The check was cashed and returned promptly, and that was the last heard from them. I have written three letters to them and received no reply to any of them yet.

"I therefore appointed myself a committee of one to write you asking for an investigation of this Marshaw Slide Co., and also that you give your readers and subscribers the benefit of said investigation as to the scheme this concern evidently is working, so that their career either will be ended or just begun, according to the way they will show up under the limelight.

"Yours for the right,

"A. A. LINDSTROM,

Another reader writes that he only heard from them after he had lodged a complaint with the Post-office authorities. This, we suggest, is the proper action to be taken by all those who have not received their goods or answers to their letters.

A GOOD IDEA.

If every exhibitor paid the same care and attention to the minor details of his business as he does to the selection of his films a good many picture houses would be earning bigger profits than they are at present. For instance, if a manager insisted upon using only late illustrated songs and, if necessary, went to a few dollars' extra expense each week to secure good slide service, his patrons would certainly appreciate this feature of his program and would naturally attend more regularly and bring their friends. The slight cost of first-class slide service would therefore prove a good investment and bring excellent results. The Novelty Slide Company, of 221 East Fifty-third street, New York City, handle song slides and lecturettes of all makers and are in a position to supply exhibitors with slides for all the very latest songs as they are issued. They are buying from twelve to fifteen new sets every week, and can easily keep the largest house supplied regularly without repeating. Their stock is complete and right-up-to-the-minute, consisting of nearly 1,000 different sets. Courteous treatment and careful study of each customer's individual requirements have earned their business the title of "The Slide Service that Satisfies."

Hickman, Cal.—Bert Dallas has opened a new moving picture show in Hall Herman's pavilion.

Hanover, Pa.—The Crouse Amusement Company, which has been showing moving pictures and giving vaudeville, in the Hanover Opera House, closed for financial reasons.

Wm. H. Swanson & Co. have engaged as their manager in Decatur, where they are operating at Powers Opera House, that hustling manager, Thompson Kress, who this season handled the business end for "The County Chairman."

A USEFUL ADJUNCT TO THE OPERATING ROOM.

Moving picture machine operators throughout the country will be much interested in learning that the Nicholas Power Company, 115-117 Nassau street, New York City, have just placed on the market a compact kit of tools suitable for their special requirements. The set includes every tool necessary for the proper handling and care of the moving picture machine and film, including the film cement, which for the first time is put up in collapsible tin tubes which will not break. Every tool has been selected with care, due consideration having been given to its usefulness, lasting qualities and price. The result is a neat looking kit, weighing about 35 ounces, 9½ inches long by 3½ inches in diameter, which can be carried in a pocket or one corner of a grip and which answers every requirement whether the operator is traveling or not. One very valuable feature which should be appreciated is that each tool has its separate place in the roll, so that when through using the operator can tell at a glance whether or not all of his tools are in place and thus reduce to a minimum his chances for loss on account of misplaced tools, which is often a considerable item. The price is within reach of all and the tools cannot be duplicated in quality elsewhere for the same money. In the operator's tool kit the Nicholas Power Company have maintained the same high standard which has brought their Power's Cameragraph into such popular demand.

As "first aid" to the successful operation of a moving picture machine, every owner or manager should see that his operator is equipped with the proper tools, and Power's tool kit certainly "fills the bill." It is expected that the film exchanges will benefit by the addition to their regular lines of this tool business, which has heretofore gone to the hardware stores.

The Nicholas Power Company will gladly furnish to the film exchanges, upon application, circulars describing the tool kit, with complete prices, which they can distribute among their customers.

THE CLAMOR FOR CHANGE A MENACE TO THE BUSINESS.

A prominent film renter in this city is quoted as saying: "There is coming a better day in the near future when all films rented will have to be arranged on the circuit plan, and the changes will be only two a week. We have a number of towns on our list where we have contracts with four out of five or six of the theaters they contain, where the owners refuse to take a film that the other subscribers in that town have or have had. And then they want a change of films every day for a slight advance over two changes a week. It's got to be stopped and if it isn't it's going to kill the moving picture business. We cannot get the films to furnish five separate theaters in the same town with different films with one change every day, which means thirty new films per week for that one town. Nix, those fellows have got to come off their horse and be content with the same films in the near future and to take films that have been used. They have got to do it or the hogs will find their business gone and the moving picture show business will go back to the one show in a town, or the traveling show."

WARNING.

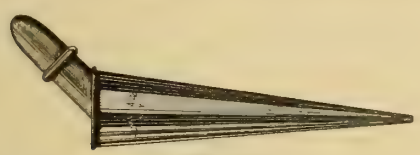
So many complaints have reached us as to the trashy nature of the text books advertised in several papers by the Driben Pub. Co., London, Ont., Can., that we again warn our readers not to purchase these books unless sent on approval.

SOUND EFFECTS FOR MOVING PICTURES.

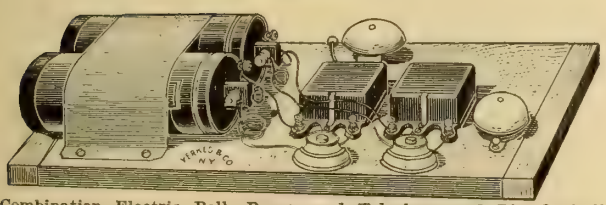
There are several things that make for the success of a moving picture. Besides the moving picture itself there is the music, there is the projection end of matters, the environment of the picture, and, above all, the sound effects. These are not the least important. Lyman Howe, that prince of moving picture exhibitors, owes much of his success to the excellence of his effects. The effects are marvelously correct in imitativeness. Why, at this moment, we recall the very vivid fidelity to nature which which the barking of a dog was imitated as he scampered across the screen at the Hippodrome last February. But how are these effects produced, and where can they be obtained?

Hen Cackle.

Combined Horse Whinney, Cow-Moo and Pig Grunt.



Rooster Crow.



Combination Electric Bell, Buzzer and Telephone and Bicycle Bell.

Yerkes & Co., 53 West Twenty-eighth street, New York, N. Y., make them, and make them extremely well. Quite recently we had the opportunity of hearing many of those effects, and some of the barn-yard sounds were so realistic we almost imagined ourselves a hundred miles out of New York City.

Yerkes & Co.'s list, which should be in the hands of every exhibitor, gives details and prices of over thirty instruments, etc., for producing these wonderful sound effects. At random we mention from it the rooster crow, the duck quack, the water splash and rain effect, the wind machine, etc.; in fact, their list is very complete. We repeat that every reader of The World should get a copy of this list, and we hope he will for his own sake, for ours, and that of Yerkes & Co.

Philadelphia, Pa., is to have another moving picture theater. The building at 913-915 Market street is being converted into a theater, to cost $50,000.

Wooster, Ohio.—The Howard rooms, corner of Liberty and Buckeye streets, are being fitted up for a moving picture show. W. H. Eyler is the proprietor.

Trenton, N. J.—Michael Crowe is adding some extensive improvements to his theater, which is located at Broad and Dye streets.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—The Queen City Amusement Company has purchased of Fred A. Schmidt a lot at 1034 Freeman avenue, where they will erect a moving picture theater.

Hutchinson, Kan.—A new ten-cent theater, the "Gem," opened in Hutchinson. Its policy is to run first-class films and vaudeville.

Havana, Ill.—The Varsity Theater has been sold by E. F. Dorrell to Messrs. Bert Newberry and Will Taylor, of Marshalltown, Ia.

Ft. Wayne, Ind.—A new moving picture theater is to be opened at 121 Washington boulevard. It will be known as the Minuet.

Allentown, Pa.—The Lyric Theater Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $40,000. The incorporators are: N. E. Worman, T. E. Ritter, G. H. Hardner, H. W. Kress and others.

THE OPERATOR'S DREAM:

A Fantasy On the Titles of Films Issued Since April 1, 1909.

By W. H. Gunby (of Gunby Bros.).

I saw "A Drunkard's Reformation" on "The Road to the Heart" "Trying to Get Arrested"; he had with him "A Rude Hostess," who was taking part in "Schneider's Anti-Noise Crusade" for the "Winning Coat." "Lady Helen's Escapade" gave her "Confidence" in "A Sound Sleeper," but she took "A Troublesome Satchel" with her on "The Drive for Life." "'Tis an Ill Wind that Blows no Good," so "Lucky Jim" and his "Twin Brothers" caught "The Eavesdropper" at "The Suicide Club" by "The Note in the Shoe" and they had "One Busy Hour" which ended in "A French Duel." "Jones and the Lady Book Agent" received "The Jilt,'" and "A Baby's Shoe" brought about the "Resurrection." During "Father's First Half Holiday" "On the Western Frontier" "The Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run" complained that his was an "Unappreciated Genius" and that "The Other Fellow" was "A Woodchopper's Child" "In the Days of Witchcraft." The "Doctored Dinner Pail" given to "The Pony Express" by the "Lunatics in Power" was "An Unsuccessful Substitution"; for "A Somnambulistic Hero" woke up on "The Interrupted Joy Ride." "The Rube and the Bunco Men" found "A Pair of Garters" belonging to "The Bachelor's Wife." "The Indian Trailer" told "A Tale of the West" to "The Chaperone" and "A Mexican's Gratitude" in "Old Heidelberg" was "One Touch of Nature." "Charles Forced to Find a Job" was "Under Suspicion" that he had seen "A Policeman in Action." "The Poet's Vision" was caused by "Too Much Advice." "Before and After" caused him to be "Sentenced to Death." "The Cyclone Sneezer," who was "The Actor's Mother," gave "Free Champagne" which "The World Upset" so "He Couldn't Lose Her" while "The Policeman Sleeps." "A Bachelor's Persistence" "Inviting His Boss to Dinner" "On the Brink of the Precipice," "The Squire and the Noble Lord" were "Forgotten" until they were "Found on the Rocks" by "The Fish Pirates." "The Queen of the Ranch" and "The Yiddisher Boy" started "A School for Lovemaking" after "A Fatal Flirtation," but "Boys Will Be Boys"; that's "Why the Mail Was Late." "The Right to Labor" on "The Inventions of a Lunatic" in the "House of Terror" was one of "Love's Triumphs." "The Martins Leave Home for a Week" was the result of "The Schoolboy's Revenge." "The Kiss of Judas" was "A Contemptible Theft." "Theodore Yearns to Be a Tough," so "Ponto Runs Away with the Milk Cart," but was "Moonstruck." "Paul Has Decided to Marry" "A Pair of White Gloves" and it only shows "There Is No Fool Like an Old Fool." "The Clever Reporter" was found to be only "A Love Sick Barber" "Hunting the Hippopotamus" with "Wilbur Wright's Aeroplane"; he suffered "The Hunter's Grief" on "The Way to Happiness," but "Blessings Sometimes Come in Disguise."

Then I woke up!

PHOTOGRAPHY AT GREAT DISTANCE.

Edward Belin, a young scientist of Lyons, France, has resumed his interesting experiments of "telephotography," or the transmission of photographs at a great distance, with some improved apparatus. Instead of using a private experimental line, he was able to use a real line from Paris to Lyons, placed at his disposition by the administration of the telephones. In eight minutes the photograph of the Mayor of Lyons, Mr. Herriot, was transmitted to the laboratory of the French Society of Photography, in Paris. In the other direction, a view photograph was transmitted in the same conditions from Paris to Lyons, where Edward Belin was at the reception post. We remind the reader that the system of stereotelephotography in question lies on the exploration of the infinitely delicate reliefs of a photograph enrolled on a revolving cylinder, by means of a needle point. In following the cavities and sallies, the needle, by means of an articulated lever, introduces in the telephonic line some variable electric resistances. The photograph is then printed on the receiver by an interrupted series of small electric currents of a trifling intensity, as it would be printed by means of very fine and delicate brushes and paint. A glass tube filled with a liquid color and placed over the receiving plate serves to outline the image. Mr. Belin hopes to transmit in two or three minutes, to the greatest distances, a picture of the carte-de-visite size.—"Phono-Cine Gazette."

Wm. H. Swanson & Co. have closed a contract with Geo. Gats, manager of the Grace Hayward Company, to furnish the film service which will be used as a feature during the fifteen weeks' Summer engagement at the Oliver Theater in Lincoln, Neb., commencing May 24, 1909.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"Free Champagne."—A Gaumont comic which has no element of dramatic quality. It is horseplay purely, and closes with a roughhouse and a hose loose, pouring water into the crowd. The audience laughs, which proves it to be funny.

"A False Accusation."—In this story of paternal devotion the Vitagraph Company has developed some dramatic situations which are worth seeing, though the whole picture by no means measures up to their standard. The acting of the father when the police search his pockets and discover the bits of food he has placed there to carry home to his sick daughter is beyond criticism, but that is the climax and the rest is merely commonplace. The congratulations when his story is learned and the diamond is found elsewhere are merely perfunctory. Possibly it might be contended that this is good acting, too, basing the declaration upon the supposition that guests who undertook to congratulate a poor entertainer would do it in that way. The ending is happy, and when the picture ends with the little girl certain of a new and influential friend everyone breathes easier. Photographically the film is uneven, though perhaps it might be contended that even photography in the mixed lighting required is impossible, but the staging should be such that there can be no uneven lighting. It isn't necessary, and it detracts from the attractiveness of an excellent subject.

"Dime Novel Dan."—Those who have watched messenger boys and others reading dime novels on the street will appreciate this bit of humor from the Vitagraph studio. It is a clever bit of acting, the principal character reproducing accurately the characteristic swagger and indifference of the average messenger boy. And as the climaxes of the novel are illustrated the picture assumes increased interest. In the main the photography is good, though there are places where it could be improved. Some Vitagraph films look dense on the screen, and this is one of them. It would appear that the positive is over printed, or else the negative is under exposed. It ought to be easy to correct a fault of this sort.

"Bridget on Strike."—A Vitagraph comic skit which graphically illustrates the helplessness of a young couple when Bridget left them. O course it is exaggerated and a whole lot of absurd things are done. Nearly the entire picture in clear photographically, and it is considered funny by the audience.

"Teddy in Jungle Land."—Whoever in the Vitagraph combination conceived this delicious bit of humor deserves the heartiest congratulations. Not for a long time, if ever, has there been a picture which contained so much genuine humor as this. While no one believes that personal peculiarities should be travestied, still Mr. Roosevelt's personality is so well known that a picture which exaggerates them in such a delicate way deserves to be seen by his admirers and traducers alike. The poses and motions of the character who impersonates Mr. Roosevelt are so realistic that it seems almost as though he were there himself. The photography is clear and of good quality.

"The World Upset."—A Gaumont comedy which is photographically good, but which seems to lack point. Some magical effects are introduced but in the main it looks like a pipe dream.

"He Couldn't Lose Her."—A picture from the Gaumont studios which has no point, unless there is something humorous in a motor-cycle with two occupants running into everything they could knock down. Some picturesque scenery is shown, and the color and tone of the film is pleasing.

"The Spoilt Child."—A Hepwix in which the photography is poor in places. It seems to have little point beyond a bit of burlesque, which is good.

"For Honor's Sake."—A Lux in which an invitation to a girl to meet a man at night is made the basis of some fair dramatic situations. If one doesn't know how this practice is frowned upon abroad this picture seems senseless. Americans will scarcely be able to comprehend why a man should be shot for asking a girl to meet him. The mistake of the father who finds the note is natural enough, and seems in harmony with the subject. The figures are not natural in their movements. They go much too jerky, a part of which is due to a poor operator, perhaps. The film is pood pictorially, but does not hold the interest of the audience.

"Neptune's Daughter."—In this Great Northern the familiar ballet maidens are introduced, and the picture makes a good impression. The acting is fair.

"The Viking's Love."—A drama from the Great Northern studios which is good as a play, but in working it out the interest has not been maintained throughout. The scene at the bridge should be stopped. It is a farce now, the bridge is so small. The costuming and staging are both striking, and the lighting in most instances is good. Only occasionally is it over lighted.

"The Temptation of John Gray."—The dangers of the gaming table are pretty general and practically everyone understands. When John Gray discovers that his mother is dying he regrets exceedingly at having lost his money gambling. Up to this point no criticism need apply. The Centaur people show photography which is fairly even throughout.

"Taming a Husband."—An Eclair comedy which has plenty of horseplay, and that is about all there is of it.

"Making Steel Rails."—One of those excellent industrial films from the Pathes which clearly represents the methods adopted in making rails. After one sees this picture one has a fairly clear idea of the appearance of the furnaces and the different processes through which the ore is carried to transform it into steel rails. Perhaps the most peculiar appearing feature of the operation to American eyes in this Pathe picture is the women working at the same hard labor as the men. This is common abroad, but not common in this country. As an educational film this one has had few equals. The technical quality is beyond criticism. In other words, it is up to the best of the Pathe productions.

"The Faithful Old Horse."—A Pathe film in which the sagacity of a horse is made to do interesting service. A little boy is left in the cold while his elders go after fagots in the forest. His fire goes out and he starts the horse along, but becomes lost in the snow. The horse goes back to the original place and induces the men to follow him to the spot where the little fellow has fallen exhausted by the wayside. As a representation of equine intelligence this is a good picture. But there are some things about it which do not work out. For example, the boy falls benumbed with cold on a clear day. The men find him buried in snow, yet so far as can be seen no snow has fallen in addition to what was already on the ground. This is a small thing, but the Pathes are usually so careful about details that it seems incredible that they should have made this error.

"The Pony Express."—An Edison picture purporting to represent the trials of a pony express rider. A love story is woven into it which becomes somewhat mixed, and it is difficult to determine which is the girl's accepted lover some of the time. The main feature is that the express rider is overtaken by Indians and his horse is wounded. The rejected lover is shot by the Indians, but manages to get to the house where the express rider's sweetheart lives and informs her of her lover's danger. She immediately rallies the cowboys and they drive the Indians away or kill them. The picture has plenty of life and action, but does not seem to represent very faithfully the life of a pony express rider. Conditions vary, of course, in different parts of the country where these riders have operated, but as a whole the appearance was the same, and this did not seem quite convincing. The quality of the film is good. The riding is good, but there is something about it which makes it appear patched up. Perhaps this criticism is unjust and undoubtedly it would please an average audience because there is a good deal of life in it, but it is so good that one wishes that it might have been made just a little better.

"Nat Pinkerton."—Another interesting picture in the series the Great Northern is putting out, depicting the exploits of Nat Pinkerton, a famous detective. In this picture he is shown measuring wits against a band of anarchists who are attempting to assassinate the Governor, and being foiled in that, dig an underground passage to the Governor's house in which they place a bomb, but before they can explode it the detective and his policemen are upon them and they are all captured. This picture has plenty of action in it, and what is better than that, it has no killing. The anarchists are hurried away to prison, but no bloodshed occurs to mar this interesting picture. The operator hurt it some by hurrying it, but otherwise no fault could be found with it.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

TWO MEMORIES.—Memory often lifts the shroud that time casts over the buried past, and sometimes it makes us long for the yesterday, and at others makes us wish that yesterday had never been. It is often a specter clothed in regrets. Henry Lawrence and Marion Francis were youthful lovers and in a spirit of jest aroused his jealousy. They quarrel and separate. Both headstrong, they never meet again. Ten years elapse, and Marion has developed into a cold-hearted woman of society, ever in the vortex of the social swim, until her tender sensibilities become blunted into absolute nonchalance. Henry, meanwhile has fallen into ill health and feels the end of his career is not far distant, so reading in the newspaper of Marion's return from Europe, writes asking her to call that he might see once more the face so dear to him. She is entertaining when the note arrives, so laughs it to scorn, but her company of friends dare her to go, which she does, accompanied by them. What a sight greets her. There in the chair sits Henry, clutching her portrait, dead. Oh, how she longs for the yesterday. Length, 313 feet.

ELOPING WITH AUNTY.—Dad was certainly "a wise old owl," and his subtle scheme would have culminated to his wishes, had Harry been a less daring lover, but "faint heart ne'er won fair lady" and Harry's heart was anything but faint. That Harry and Margie deeply loved each other is most apparent; that Dad had a strong aversion for Harry as a son-in-law is also apparent, and when he finds them in clandestine conference there is something doing. Harry is chased about the room by Dad with a cane, which in a wild sweep at Harry goes through a pier mirror—Oh, the woe of it. This might be considered ominous, and it was for Dad, but it was the omen of good fortune for the lovers. As an extreme measure Dad decides to send Margie to Europe with his sister, —her aunty—to be out of reach of Harry. Bright scheme, you would say. Well Aunty's vanity was the undoing. She insists on a new and elaborate gown, so Dad gives her the money to buy it. Harry learns of this and follows Aunty to the store and buys an exact duplicate of her traveling outfit. Attired in it he visits Margie's home. Upon entering he is almost confronted by Aunty similarly attired. To hide he dodges behind the mirror, and oh horror, the broken glass has been removed. Here is a predicament. Aunty is approaching. Ah! an idea. Harry stands his ground and when Aunty comes to the mirror, she also not knowing it has been removed, he mimics her antics to a nicety, so she imagines him a reflex, and so exits perfectly satisfied with herself. Dad then appears and shoving a roll of bills into masquerading Harry's hand, sends him off with Margie for Europe (?), but instead they go to the minister's. Length, 614 feet.

THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH.—Beautiful adaptation of Dickens' famous story. There is no novelist that is dearer to the hearts of readers than Charles Dickens. His stories are all so homely, peopled with lovable characters, that the heart at once goes out to them. Most popular among his works is "The Cricket on the Hearth," a story founded on that dear old superstition that the chirping of the cricket was ominous of good luck and woe to the household when it is hushed. The Biograph Company, appreciating the sentiment of this work, has taken special care in making this production evince the true atmospheric tenderness intended by Dickens. The settings are typical and the scenes have the local color, while the characterization is of the quaint old English type. All this is vivified by superb photography. The story is so well known to everyone that it would be useless to dwell at any great length on it, so that a mere outline will be given here. Opening in the home of Caleb Plummer, the old toymaker, we see his son, Edward, departing for the sea. A tender farewell to father and blind sister, Bertha, takes him to the road where he bids adieu to his sweetheart, May Fielding. There is then a lapse of three years and we find honest John Peerybingle the husband of Dot. Mrs. Fielding has gotten into moderate straits and consents to the marriage of Old Tackleton, the grouch, to May. Of course this is repugnant to May whose heart is for Edward. Edward returning stops on the way at the inn where he learns of the approaching nuptials of Tackleton and May. Buying a disguise from a strolling Merry Andrew, he goes in the garb of an old wayfarer on John's cart to see Dot and find out the truth. John, prompted by Tackleton, watches the pair and not recognizing Edward, assumes he is a lover and the first cloud shrouds the little home. Edward upon learning from Dot how inimical the match is to May resolves to carry off May, which he does with the assistance of Dot. They are married in the roadway just as the much perturbed Tackleton appears. Well, John discovers what a fool he has been in doubting Dot, Tackleton realizes what an unpopular grouch he has been and decides to change, while Bertha and Old Caleb are overjoyed at the return of Edward. It goes without saying that the happiest couple in the village are Edward and May who are now Mr. and Mrs. Edward Plummer, if you please. Length, 985 feet.

BROTHERS IN ARMS.—A military drama. Brothers in friendship though they were, they wooed the same girl, one to suffer the pangs of rejection, the other the smiles of triumph. Yet they remained as loyal friends as before and went to war on the same call to arms in the same volunteer company; the one with smiles in his heart as captain, the other with gloom in his soul as sergeant. Separated by technical rank, still they were "brothers in arms."

On a bloody field Captain Hawley fell wounded while leading his men and through the chaos of shot and shell, Sergeant Carroll helped him back to safety only to fall victim to an exploding shell himself as the nurses were reached.

Amid the horrors of a field hospital they parted and little did either think what changes time had in store for them or under what circumstances they would meet again.

Unwilling to return to his native village because his love for the captain's betrothed still lived, unable to secure permanent or remunerative work because of his crippled condition, Sergeant Carroll became a derelict though still honest, and twenty years later, found sleeping in an unfinished house, was arrested and arraigned for vagrancy.

Captain Hawley returned from the war, wed the girl of his choice and twenty years later found an honored place on the bench.

It was his fate then for the old sergeant to be arraigned before his former captain, yet the latter did not know him until in extenuation of his misfortune, the sergeant told the story of his injury on the field and how it had been received.

Leaving the bench, with tears in his eyes the judge sentenced him to spend the remainder of his day in his own home an honored guest and the same friend of his family that he had been to his captain in the war. Approximate length, 975 feet.

THE CHILD'S PRAYER.—A sturdy fisherman of the New England coast, wresting a living frfom the ocean, content with his daily toil and happy in the possession of a loving wife and child, returns with his catch to find a letter awaiting him from a large fish contractor offering him a contract in place of another fisherman who has failed to live up to his agreement.

He accepts the contract and hastens home with the joyful news. Next morning, bidding wife and child good-by, with renewed energy, and hopeful of increased business and added comforts for wife and child, he sails to sea.

The discredited fisherman, nursing vengeance, further inflames his passion by drinking heavily. He watches his opportunity, makes his way to the beach, comes upon his rival, fells him and sends the unconscious man adrift in a leaking boat.

Insane from drink and jealousy he seeks his rival's home to wreak further vengeance. He comes upon the fisherman's child kneeling in prayer, and listens to the childish pleading for her father's safe return—and asking God to bless all fishermen.

Her appeal touches his better nature and overcome with remorse he rushes away hoping to be in time to undo his murderous work—but the boat is far from land a mere speck in the distance. After heroic efforts he succeeds in reaching the sinking boat, rescues his rival just as the boat goes down.

The fisherman is welcomed by his alarmed and anxious wife. The little one overwhelms him with caresses and assures him that it was her prayers that brought him home safe. From without his late enemy gazes through the cottage window at the happy reunion and departs thankful in having mercifully escaped a felon's act. Approximate length, 660 feet.

PROFESSOR FIX FIXED.—A farcial comedy. Professor Fix was a fixer. A man of distinguished appearance, with whiskerial adornments after the fashion of Napoleon the Third, suave and polished in manner and plausible in speech it was not difficult for him to separate a gullible public from its money by various fraudulent amusement schemes. So easy was the game for the professor that he grew cynical of the public's wisdom and refused to believe that any section of it had sufficient sophistication to tell the difference between a ferry boat and an office building.

He was at the very pinnacle of such a mood when he launched his ventriloquial show at a certain well patronized county fair. He challenged the world with $5,000 to produce his equal in the line he pretended to excel in.

Unfortunately two mischievous boys gained access to the tent and made off with the dummies for the professor's famous act. His mind was fertile, however, and he used live men dressed up as dummies and through them produced the ventriloquial results.

But alas, alackaday and fearful for the professor when his performance was at the very height of his marvels his dummies forgot their parts and began to converse amiably when the professor's back was turned. The audience arose en masse at such a denouement and what happened to the professor, his dummies and his theater is a thing that can be well left to the imagination.

That the entire receipts went to the physician they ultimately reached for dressing the wounds of himself and his men was not the least but undoubtedly the most bitter of the professor's troubles goes without the saying. Approximate length, 335 feet.

THE BLIND MAN OF JERUSALEM.—A superb historical production. Magnificent scenes, beautiful settings, rich costumes, combined with perfect dramatization.

A rich man, living in a splendid palace, in the city of Jerusalem, with his daughter and many servants, surrounded by every possible luxury, but blind, is healed of his affliction by Christ. Having regained his sight he does not make this known to his household, but quietly observes them for a time and sees how his servants rob him and even his daughter imposes upon him. Discouraged at his findings he goes out upon the highway where he again meets Christ, but this time He is carrying His cross and being led to Calvary. The sight of the suffering Saviour teaches him to forgive his offenders. Approximate length, 648 feet.

THE GLORIES OF SUNSET.—A spectacular series of most gorgeous views of the setting sun. The pictures were taken at Menton, in the southern part of France, and present positively the most beautiful panorama of the sun sinking beyond mountain ranges and casting the first shadows of night over the sea, ever reproduced. The series concludes with a grand view of a silvery sea illuminated by moonlight. Appropriate tints throughout. Approximate length, 285 feet.

THE ACCUSING DOUBLE.—At a gaming table at Monte Carlo, a young man loses his fortune, which is won by an American gentleman. Disconcerted the young man saunters about in front of the casino deploring his ill-luck, when he meets the American strolling along towards the seacoast.

A cheerful conversation is under way when an idea occurs to the young man to regain his losses, and he promptly proceeds to execute it. When he observes that the coast is clear he draws his pistol and with it kills his companion, whereupon he robs him, and then takes the body in a boat out on the high seas where he throws it overboard.

The disappearance of the American is apparent and a search instituted. A renowned detective put upon the case is soon at work in unraveling the mystery. Disguised as the American the detective makes his appearance in public. He is prompt to note the effect this has upon all he meets and before long he is on the trail of the guilty man.

He interrupts an impending engagement and succeeds in securing a confession of guilt.

This subject teems with interest and excitement and will also be appreciated for the photographic quality and detail. Approximate length, 891 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

HOW JONES PAID HIS DEBTS.—With any number of bills to pay and no money for the purpose and no prospects of securing any, Mr. Jones is in sore straits. One collector after another calls and failing to secure the amount due him reclaims the goods sold to Jones. As a result he loses his suit of clothes, hat, shoes, etc., and is obliged to don an evening suit at midday.

After several escapades which enable him to secure an overcoat and a meal for himself and pet dog, he strikes upon a novel idea of clearing his indebtedness at one stroke. He disguises himself and then posts a death notice at the entrance to his home. Collectors calling to make their claims seeing the notice of Jones' death close their accounts. Jones watches the performance in his disguise, chuckles cheerfully at his cleverness and starts life over again with a clean slate. Approximate length, 604 feet.

PANTHER HUNTING ON THE ISLE OF JAVA.—This film gives a perfect idea of the difficulties encountered in a hunt for one of the most subtle and ferocious beasts of prey making its haunts in the jungles, the panther.

The dense forest with its masses of undergrowth are clearly shown; the hunters winding their way along the trail in search of game. They endeavor to beat the animal from his lair and then set their traps to capture him.

Our photographers were fortunate in being present at one of the finest catches of the season and give all details. The entire series is intensely interesting and exciting. Approximate length, 357 feet.

OFFICER McCUE.—Officer McCue is on duty. He regulates the traffic, helps children across the street and makes himself all around useful.

Suddenly a runaway horse comes towards him, a young lady in the buggy. Officer McCue stops the horse, but is hit by the shaft of the buggy and rendered unconscious. He is brought to the hospital and there visited by the young lady and her father, a banker. Both come to thank him for services rendered.

A few weeks afterwards Officer McCue is on duty again. While patrolling the lonely streets he notices two suspicious characters. He follows them and soon comes to a thieve's den which he raids single-handed.

After due process and conviction of the thieves, the stolen goods are restored to the rightful carries. A pearl necklace is returned to the banker's daughter. Officer McCue is introduced as the one responsible for the return of the property. She recognizes the officer and invites him to call.

Officer McCue is promoted to the position of sergeant and as such it is his good luck to again render services to the banker's daughter. On an errand to charity she is held up by thieves and only by the timely arrival of Officer McCue is she saved from harm.

The banker notices the affection which has sprung up between the officer and his daughter, and proud of the hero of so many encounters accepts him as a son-in-law. Length, 695 feet.

MR. INQUISITIVE.—The henpecked husband of Mrs. Inquisitive was chased out of the house for trying to listen to a conversation between herself and two other ladies.

Mr. Inquisitive gets into trouble at the fish market. He butts into everything until a boy fastens a rope on his leg. Now the trouble surely begins.

He butts into everything he meets, but in a way not intended by him. At last he is caught by the chasing crowd and given a good bouncing. Length, 243 feet.

A BRIDE WON BY BRAVERY.—A ranchman out in the wooly West while sitting on his porch receives a letter, as follows:

"Dear Uncle Jack: Brother and I leave New York for Arizona to spend our summer vacation with you. Will arrive Monday, 14th. Please meet us at the station.

"Your loving niece,

Inez."

The uncle sends his buggy to the station where Inez and her brother are received by the cowboys. Joe, one of the cowboys, falls in love with the beautiful girl and shows her all kinds of attention.

While in the woods picking flowers, Inez is surprised by greasers with the intent to rob her. Joe comes up in time to drive the robbers off and in return is rewarded with a sweet kiss. He guides the girl to the Colonel's home, but is rudely driven away by the Colonel who does not wish one of his cowboys to pay attention to his niece. In her room Inez writes the following note to Joe:

"Dear Mr. Joe: I ask your forgiveness for Uncle's rudeness and thank you for your bravery displayed in my behalf. Will see you at the bridge at seven.

Inez."

The seventh hour sees the couple together at the bridge. The evening being cool, the cowboy takes his kerchief and fastens it around Inez's neck. After a walk Inez returns to her uncle's home. She forgets all about the kerchief. The uncle recognizes the same and is furious about his niece's disobedience. He tells her to prepare to go home and sends a note of discharge to Joe.

While Inez is getting ready for her departure a greaser looks through the wondow and, noticing all the presents the Colonel gives the young lady, decides to hold her up and rob her.

The time has come for the departure. Uncle, nephew and niece enter the buggy to drive to the station. Four of the greasers have taken to the woods and hold up the party. They bag the girl and bind her brother and the Colonel to the trees. Happily Joe comes this way. He frees the Colonel and at once mounts a horse to give the alarm. In a moment the cowboys are in pursuit. They track the greasers at their hiding place, a fierce struggle ensues, the greasers are overpowered, roped and led away to be strung to the next tree. The girl is returned to her uncle, who does no longer object to the marriage of the two young people whom destiny brought together. Length, 835 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THE BONDSMAN'S FATE.—The darkies are laboring in the cotton field and one of the old women stops work for a while to amuse her little child who is in a playful mood. The planter comes along and remonstrates with the woman for her idleness, whereupon the latter's husband interferes and for his insolence receives a severe flogging from the master. Vowing vengeance, the enraged darkie follows the cruel planter to his dwelling and as the latter's wife comes out to greet him she is struck with a bullet which was aimed at her husband. The assassin then takes to the woods, but soon a posse, lead by the planter, are on the trail of the fugutive, who leads his pursuers a long and tedious chase. He is finally cornered but determined to fight until the end, he whips out a knife and wounds one of his pursuers and tries to escape again, but this time they have him surrounded and he is compelled to surrender and pay the penalty of his crime. He is led to a nearby tree, where, in the presence of his wife and little child, he is strung up and left hanging to one of the branches. Length, 367 feet.

CURED BY GYMNASTICS.—An old woman, who is continually complaining of feeling ill, becomes a terrible bore to her daughter and son-in-law, with whom she lives, and in order to get a little piece of mind they summon a doctor to administer to the whining old invalid. The physician being somewhat strenuous in his ideas of administering to his patients recommends a course of gymnastics to be administered in doses of twenty hours' duration every day, and the old woman, feeling that it will benefit her takes to the idea immediately.

The young couple take her in charge and proceed to follow out the doctor's instructions and the subsequent incidents which take place are extremely funny, for the old invalid enters into the spirit with a will.

Her first stunt is a trip on a bicycle, during which she gets a few good falls, but this does not shatter her nerve for immediately after returning, she has a turn at punching the bag; then a very funny fencing lesson, after which she goes out to a club where she is matched to wrestle with a professional, and comes out victor in this very amusing contest. The young people then take her for a horseback ride, but somewhere on the journey she gets tangled in the branches of a tree, and the horse returns home without her, but the game old athlete soon comes straggling along and is ready for another turn. They next go to an athletic club, where she challenges the winner in a boxing contest, but she is not so fortunate in this altercation, for she is presented with two pretty black eyes.

Finally they rig up a pulling machine and so strenuously does she use this device that she pulls down the partition between the two apartments letting in her enraged neighbors, who would have made short work of her had she not been in such splendid condition, due to her training. As it is, she stands her ground and soon puts them to rout. Length, 564 feet.

PROFITABLE MARRIAGE.—Here we see a young man about town who has a most disagreeable task beofre him and that is to ask his stingy old uncle for financial assistance. The old man, after hearing what his sporty nephew has to say, refuses absolutely to give him any cash, but promises the young man if he will marry a nice young girl, to let him have twenty-five thousand dollars as a wedding gift. This proposition meets with the approval of the young sport, but he is at a loss to know which young woman among his acquaintances to choose for a life partner, so hastens to a matrimonial bureau, where he selects a dashing vivacious young damsel as his future wife. The jolly pair start out to have the ceremony performed and while going down the street they secure the service of some tradesmen, who volunteer to act as their witnesses. The whole party crowd into a cab and proceed to the Justice of the Peace, where the knot is tied, after which the young man treats his guests to a square meal in honor of the great occasion.

Going then to the home of his uncle he presents his blushing bride, who wins the old man's heart at once by her affectionate ways and he signs the wedding check, after which the happy young couple start on their way to enjoy the bliss of married life.

The last picture shows the home of the couple one year later, where great excitement reigns, for a great father holding three kicking little the happy father holding three kicking little cherubs in his arms while he listens to his delighted old uncle's words of congratulation. Length, 502 feet.

AN OBLIGING FRIEND.—A young man who is in love with a pretty maiden and hopes to be successful in winning her affections, meets with a chilly rebuff from her exacting parents when he approaches them with the proposition that he would like to make their daughter his happy bride. Determined to win her at any cost he goes to call on a friend, who is a hypnotist, and after explaining the situation, the latter consents to help him out of the difficulty. The young lover receives an invitation to attend a reception at his lady love's home, so takes the hypnotist with him, whom he introduces to the large assemblage. Upon hearing of his wonderful talents the people all become curious and request him to give a demonstration of his powers, which he gladly consents to do. He gets busy and hypnotizes everyone in the room except his pal and the young woman, the latter availing herself of the opportunity, hurries away with the hypnotist while her admirer remains amusing himself at the expense of the hypnotized crowd, who are going through all sorts of droll performances. When the hypnotist gets outside he sends in a note to his friend telling him that he has fallen in love with the lady, and has decided to elope with her himself, so he hastens away to have the marriage performed while his unsuspecting pal waits for the spell to lift from the other guests until he takes them into his confidence to seek consolation for the terrible wrong done him by his obliging friend. Length, 489 feet.

MISS FAUST.—This beautifully colored film is a very amusing satire on the story of Faust and must be seen in order to be appreciated, as the many funny incidents which occur are difficult to describe. The whole story is burlesqued by competent artists in such a clever manner that the absurdity of some of the situations is vastly amusing.

In the first picture Miss Faust is seen bemoaning the fact that she is no longer young and beautiful, when all at once a happy thought comes to her and she decides to call up the infernal regions and inform old Satan that she will sell him her soul if he will only gratify her wish to possess youth and beauty again. The jolly old creature takes her seriously and pays a visit to her home where the bargain is completed. We next see her transformed into a beautiful young girl gazing on a vision of her future lover, a dashing young fellow riding a bicycle. This is only a vision, however, which Satan has called up, but which had so fascinated Miss Faust that she starts out immediately to find the reality. Her love affair is an extremely eventful one garnished with auto rides with a good guardian angel as chauffeur. Her trials as well as joys are many, but her greatest annoyer is old Satan, who is continually reminding her of the bargain she made with him. Good eventually overcomes evil, however, and we see Miss Faust entering paradise with her lover, where the angels give her a hearty welcome and all bids fair for her eternal happiness, while old Satan, angry and disgusted, returns to his home in the warmer regions. Length, 623 feet.

ALPHONSE GETS IN WRONG.—Alphonse attains that state of inebriation where he becomes oblivious of all that is transpiring around him and as a result lies down on a pile of dirt near an excavation where the fellow who is digging throws up the dirt, which nearly covers Alphonse up. A woman and little girl who are passing discover the sleeping man and give an alarm. The people flock to the spot and there find Alphonse enjoying his blissful slumbers, but all hesitate to approach him, for they are under the impression that a great crime has been committed and the whole populace is called out to lend their aid to the doomed man. He finally wakes up and makes his escape, leaving the curious crowd to think over the strange proceedings.

He then rushes down the street and thinking himself out of the reach of his enemies, falls asleep near a clothing store. Soon the crowd comes upon him and, realizing his condition, they play all sorts of jokes on him, but when he awakens this time he is in a very animated condition and he sets them all a very lively pace in trying to escape his wrath. Length, 341 feet.

A VISIT TO THE LONDON ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—This picture is extremely interesting and educational and is bound to be a great success among people living in remote parts who are not fortunate in being able to visit a zoo of such magnitude. This is one of the largest and best equipped zoos in the world and has a great collection of rare birds and animals, which are shown at close range in this picture. It is amusing to watch the antics of the Polar bears playing a game of water polo, then going through the other compartments we see some fine species of zebras, giraffes and all sorts of animals, birds and reptiles too numerous to mention. Length, 584 feet.

BOTTLED UP.—A clever chemist concocts a fluid which, when poured upon an object immediately liquifies it. He starts out and through his using the wonderful fluid at the proper moment, he makes himself extremely useful in a very droll manner. Going along the street he witnesses a hold-up in which a thug attacks an old tradesman and steals his money. The latter gives chase, but the thief gets away and at an isolated spot he sits down to count over his spoils. The old chemist comes along and pours some of the contents of the bottle on him and immediately the fellow melts and becomes a fluid, which the chemist sops up and puts into a bottle. Next he meets the victim and melts him also, pouring him into another bottle. Going down the street he sprinkles some on a policeman and the usual transformation takes place and he, too, is bottled up. Feeling that he has now enough material for his first experiment the professor returns to his laboratory and there he pours the contents of the different bottles into a large caldron, and by adding another ingredient he is successful in transforming the different people to their normal condition. In the same tight quarters the thief finds himself face to face with his accuser and a representative of the law, the latter makes quick work of smashing his way to liberty and the last we see of the party they are on the way to the police station to settle up matters. Length, 371 feet.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

A WARTIME SWEETHEART.—The opening scene occurs in Frederickstown, Md., at the home of Judge Danton. The Judge's pretty daughter is gathering fresh buds to decorate the parlors when a group of excited neighbors enter, newspapers in hand—the war so long dreaded had come, the first shot had been fired at Fort Sumpter, and the nation is in a turmoil. Laura has half a dozen admirers in her native town, among whom none are more persistent in their attentions than a violent tempered man of middle age—Gaston Jamison. Laura fears his nature, but because of his wealth and family, his suit is looked upon with favor by her father.

Young Frank Colfax is Laura's choice, and as the war news breaks in upon their quiet home the two men in question arrive to press their claim, for both are determined to enlist in the Union Army. A stormy scene follows, in which Laura declares her preference for Colfax, and the chagrined Jamison departs vowing vengeance. An opportunity soon offers, for he is appointed Colonel of Volunteers by his townsmen, and our next scene shows the interior of the Maryland Club. We find the new Colonel enlisting men for the Union side. Colfax enters and offers his services as a private soldier in the Colonel's regiment, and it is plain to be seen that his elderly rival enjoys the prospect of a private in the ranks, eh? "I'll make him regret the day he won her love," is Jamison's mental comment as Colfax signs his enlistment papers, thus placing himself at the beck and call of a man whose hatred he has incurred and the bitterness of which he has yet to learn. The bitter indignities Frank suffers, until, by sheer bravery, he elevates himself to the rank of officer, are innumerable.

May, 1863—Battlefield near Frederickstown, Md. Hooker and Jackson, in battle array, are facing each other, each eagerly watching, waiting and fencing for strategic advantage—a scene that will make the heart of every patriotic American beat with exultation. Jamison sees an opportunity to rid himself of his rival. A Confederate battery, placed on the brow of a hill has, for several hours, been shelling the right wing of the Union position, when Frank Colfax receives on order from his Colonel, "Dismount your men and charge that battery. Silence it if you lose every man in your command," it reads. Frank is staggered by the order, for its purport dawns upon him—"The coward means to send me to my death—and my men, why does he doom them?"

The movement is executed and the entire action faithfully presented in this wonderful reproduction of actual war happening. Then comes a scene at the Colonel's field quarters—instead of dooming his rival to death, as he expected, the boy is the hero of the hour, complimented and lionized by every officer in the army corps. "I'll succeed yet," soliloquizes the Colonel. "I'll implicate the girl he loves, goad him into striking me, get him imprisoned for the offense."

A letter, forwarded by courier to Laura, has led the poor girl to believe Frank is to be shot at sunrise, and she has come through the lines to bid her soldier lover farewell. The meeting takes place in an old church, now used by the Federals for a prison, and Laura goes on her knees to the Colonel to plead for her lover's life. Poor Frank, bound to the stairs, is forced to witness her humiliation, as well as suffer the indignity of seeing the cowardly Colonel attempt to force his drunken embraces on the woman he loves. But Laura is well able to protect herself, as the sequel proves, for she seizes a bayonet from a table and the Colonel finds himself hors de combat and his rival freed. All the fury of the girl's nature has been aroused, and in the scenes that follow she proves herself "A Wartime Sweetheart," for through her quick wit, she not only escapes from the maddened officer herself, but takes her lover with her through the lines—a hurried marriage service—then, after weeks of peril, the couple find themselves on the great American frontier, where the sturdy spirit of their forefathers enables them to carve out a future.

THE EMPTY SLEEVE; Or, Memories of By-Gone Days.—A former Union officer, now an old G. A. R. Veteran, and his wife are observed in a romantic spot by the roadside. Despite their advanced years they are still sweethearts and are visiting an old trysting place of their youth. A commotion down the street claims their attention, and while looking in that direction the elderly couple are transformed into a young pair as they appeared in 1861, he wearing a United States officer's uniform, she dressed in costume of that period. From the direction in which the lady is pointing a company of Union soldiers approach, while from the opposite direction come their mothers, wives, daughters and sweethearts. After a brief farewell between the soldiers and their loved ones, our hero takes command and they march off. We next find the officer pictured in command of a Union outpost; on the brow of a distant hill a rebel battery is firing upon them. The General rides up, takes in the situation and calls for volunteers to silence the Confederate battery. Our hero, with others, answers the call, charges up the hill and captures the battery. After the engagement, among the dead and wounded is our officer, who has lost an arm. He is taken to a hospital, and under careful attention of a young nurse soon regains his strength, is honorably discharged and sent home, the nurse accompanying him. He is warmly welcomed to the old home by his mother and father and the nurse shortly afterward becomes his wife. The vision disappears, the old couple stroll on, meeting a company of veterans. Our hero takes command and all proceed to the grandstand, where the commander makes a Decoration Day speech. As a fitting climax we see a Union and Confederate soldier clasping hands. Length, 590 feet.

HE COULDN'T DANCE, BUT HE LEARNED.—Mr. Wallflower, attending a ball, is seen leaning against the side of the building acting very bored. He cannot dance, watches the others and, endeavoring to get out of their way, is upset several times. The host introduces him to several ladies and to them he explains his inability to dance. The dancers turn away laughing and as festivities are resumed the host introduces him to a young lady who insists that he make an attempt. He tries, ending up by knocking over the punch bowl and table. He rushes madly from the house, reaches home and sits down disgusted with himself and lights his pipe. Suddenly in the paper this article meets his gaze: "Why be a wallflower? Professor Miracle teaches dancing in one lesson. Special hypnotic method." He at once decides to become an adept and starts for the professor's. The latter enters as Wallflower enters and explains his mission. The professor hypnotizes him, Wallflower leaves and outside tries some intricate buck steps and is elated over his proficiency. He dances down the street and around the corner, where he runs into an old man. The old gent watches for a moment, then begins dancing himself. Further along they come upon an old maid. Wallflower abandons the old man and commences dancing with her. In front of a cigar store they are doing their steps when the Indian image standing in front gets the fever and starts. A stuffed bear standing before a fur store also gets under the spell and dances with the Indian. A policeman, who endeavors to stop the proceedings, gets the habit and joins the merry throng. They all dance along until they come to a restaurant and, entering, the customers get the habit and before long the place is a total wreck.

Back to Wallflower's apartments. He is seen to tip his chair backwards, his pipe drops from his mouth, he picks it up, draws furiously on it, but finds no fire. He then sits in the chair with an attitude of despair, realizing that he has had a pipe dream. Length, 400 feet.

CIGARETTE MAKING; From Plantation to Consumer.—This interesting industrial film deals with the making of the cigarette, opening with a scene on a Turkish tobacco plantation, then a trip through the Hassan factory of the American Tobacco Company, in which we have brought before us the different processes through which the tobacco goes before it reaches the smoker; blending and steaming, softening, cutting, drying, cooling, dressing; also the wonderful automatic cigarette making machines, preparing of the cork tips, and cork-tipping the cigarettes, box making machine, machine packing, stamping, etc. Length, 625 feet.

OLD SWEETHEARTS OF MINE; A Fantasy in Smoke.—A young man enters his cozy library, sits in an easy chair before the fireplace, takes a cigarette from the table and, dozing off, dreams of his sweethearts of former days. He sees in turn his summer girl, a small brunette, accompanying him to the tennis court; then at a fancy ball another girl, blonde and tall. They are sitting under the palms in the conservatory, where he proposes and is refused. In the next scene he is waiting in the woods to keep an appointment with a plump little country girl. They meet and engage in a pretty love scene. Next he makes love to a bathing girl; then his dream changes and, by way of diversion, the cigarettes on the table hop from the box and execute all manner of funny stunts. The young fellow awakes with a start, looks about the room, realizes it was all a dream, lights another cigarette and dozes off once more. A lady enters the room, tiptoes over, kisses him on the forehead and, as he awakens, puts her hands over his eyes. He feels for the wedding ring, guesses who it is and fondly embraces his wife. Length, 355 feet.

THE FARMER'S GRANDSON.—Inspector Brown at the estate—is a wicked and brutal person, who is always quarreling with the workmen; but at the same time he is sly enough to ingratiate himself by sly words with the Squire's daughter Elsie, so much so that she, as the inspector one day is turned out on account of his brutality, follows him, giving up her beautiful home and her old father on his behalf.

A year later we see her in a poor looking room in a big city. Brown is now just as brutal to Elsie as he was before to the workmen; he is not even ashamed of forcing her to give up the last of her savings, although she is ill, having just been confined with a child. This money he spends on bad women.

Twelve years have passed. Brown has long since left Elsie, who is obliged to support herself and her boy, Charles, by sewing. Charles now does not want to be an encumbrance to his mother any longer, and we see him leaving the little home to go out in the country to look for a situation.

Accidentally he comes to his grandfather's estate; he is engaged and soon becomes the favorite of the old Squire.

One day Charles is taken ill, and the Squire takes him to his own room and puts him to bed there. One night Brown who is now a drunken and disreputable individual, sneaks into the place with the intention to murder the Squire. Charles hears a noise, looks out of the window and is at once equal to the occasion. Instead of giving the alarm to the Squire, he snatches a revolver, which is always lying on a small table beside the bed and lies down again quietly, as if asleep. As Brown, a few moments later, bends over the old gentleman's bed with the knife in his hand, Charles fires the revolver and the rascal falls to the floor severely wounded.

Charles gets permission for his mother to come and see him, and to this effect he writes a letter home. As Elsie receives the letter and sees the well known address she believes her father has forgiven her, and hurries joyfully back to her old home. But the meeting between father and daughter does not turn out as expected; the old gentleman does not want to have anything to do with his daughter, but as his little rescuer puts father's and daughter's hands in each other, he cannot resist any longer, he forgives her and is now happy to have his two dear ones near him.

THE BEGGARMAID.—Maggie meets Dr. Holmes as she stands begging on the bridge trying to get a little money to buy medicine for her sick mother. The doctor defends her against some young fellows, who are making fun of her, asks her about her circumstances and sees her home, but her sick mother has already expired.

Maggie becomes housekeeper to the doctor, and after having managed his home for some months in a capable and quiet way, she accepts his offer of marriage out of gratitude and becomes his wife.

Maggie soon learns that love and gratitude are two quite different emotions, and as one of the doctor's friends is making love to her, she gives way to her feelings and runs away with him, leaving her good husband and her beautiful home.

Accidentally she discovers that she has trusted a very unprincipled person. They quarrel, and Maggie stands once more poor and alone in the street.

She now goes through all the phases of a miserable and disconsolate woman, she has even to beg for bread in the streets as before. One day she meets her husband. They look at each other for a moment but as he passes on she rushes away to throw herself in the river. At the last moment Dr. Holmes succeeds in rescuing her, and the unhappy woman is taken unconscious to her old home.

When Maggie opens her eyes in the old surroundings the remembrance of old happy days comes back to her; her first thought is to run away from those who know of her disgrace, but at the same moment the doctor stands before her. She sinks down under his kind and earnest gaze, hardly daring to touch his hand. The high-minded man struggles with himself for a moment, but as he sees that the poor woman's remorse is real, he lifts her up and puts his arm round her, the poor storm-tossed woman has again found a haven.

CENTAUR FILM COMPANY.

SCRAPPY BILL.—Bill was a born fighter. We first see him pitching pennies and doing up a larger boy who tries to cheat him. A stout woman interferes, and Bill puts her out of commission with one swift punch. A funny and fat German now takes a hand, and Bill doubles him up with a punch in the "bread basket." The German and woman chase Bill, who upsets old Deacon Jones; then he bowls over an Irish laborer who is just about to enjoy a can of beer. The Irishman pitches into the German, and there is a battle royal between the two men, the fat woman mixing up in the fray. Bill leads his pursuers until he is almost winded. A corner grocery is making a special sale of lard. Bill spreads the lard over the sidewalk. The German, the Irishman, the woman, a drunk and the Deacon strike the lard and the sidewalk. An excruciatingly funny mix-up follows, during which Bill escapes.

We next see Bill, grown to manhood, at a prize fight. The champion knocks out a professional fighter, then a funny coon fighter. Bill now steps into the ring. After a big, hot fight, Bill knocks the champion out.

Bill is next seen in a saloon taking a drink. A comedy bum "touches" Bill for a drink. The bum creates havoc at the lunch counter and is knocked out by the bouncer. Bill protests, and shows his sympathy for the bum by knocking out the bouncer. The bartender gets gay with a club, and Bill pulls him over the bar and lams him. A cop comes in and Bill is compelled to clean out the place. The cop gets two other policemen to help him. The three are too much for even Bill and after a tussle they land him behind the bars. But no ordinary jail can hold Scrappy Bill. With a few good punches he knocks a hole through the brick wall and escapes.

A black bear has escaped from a circus and attacks Bill's best girl. Bill to the rescue. He knocks the bear out in one round.

Bill gets married and he now finds that he has met his conqueror. Coming home to supper, he finds fault with his wife's cooking. Here follows a serious comedy scene that, we feel sure, has never been equalled in a motion picture. Wifie smashes a hot pudding over Bill's head, and then fires all the crockery and everything in the room at Bill. Bill sees that he is overmatched, and on his knees begs Wifie to let up and forgive him, which she does.

This picture is a picture for men, women and children. The action is fast and funny. The acting is superb, the fighters being all real professional knights of the prize ring.

EMPIRE FILM EXCHANGE.

WHY FATHER LEARNED TO RIDE (Hepworth).—The trials and tribulations of lovers who fail to obtain the parental consent to their match have furnished meat for many a comedy, but in this film there are many new ideas demonstrated. The girl appears coming through the home gate with her father. The lover appears and an elopement is secretly arranged before the old man knows what is going on behind his back. The next scene shows the lover arriving on a bicycle and gives a view of the girl appearing at an upper window of her home, as Juliet. The lover procures a ladder and the girl comes down, but at this moment the father appears. The lovers depart leaving behind the bicycle, and the father endeavors to utilize the machine in tracking them. He starts off after the fleeing pair, after making his descent from the upper window of his home in a most laughable fashion. During the chase many mishaps befall the old man. He stops at one place to have a drink of water and a mischievous boy ties the wheels of the bicycle to a fence, so that when the old man starts off again he is "spilled." The lovers are then shown entering a pasture where many cows are grazing. The father appears on the wheel, but the intended son-in-law is too quick for him and shuts the pasture gate just in time to afford the old man another upset. Finally the father gets into the pasture but several unruly cows give him a splendid chase. The lovers are next seen crossing a narrow foot bridge over a stream. The father on wheel endeavors to follow them but falls into the water. The lover rescues him and the pair are forgiven. Length, 375 feet.

COPENHAGEN ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS (Paul).—Nothing is more interesting to the average audience than animal life, and here almost every animal known to man is shown in its quarters in the famous Zoo of Copenhagen. The keepers evidence a bravery in petting and playing with these wild beasts that is little suspected even by those accustomed to seeing "animal acts" on the vaudeville stage or at the circus. The feeding of the hippopotamus by hand, as well as the interest shown in the seals by their keeper are well worth the time and attention devoted to them in this series of views. Nearly the entire range of cages and enclosures has been carefully photographed by the makers of this film and it should prove a worthy addition to any picture programme. Length, 495 feet.

YOU SHALL PAY FOR IT (Itala).——Two chums are seen sitting upon a bench in a public park. A bad boy smashes their hats and each man blames the prank upon the other and vows vengeance. In attempting to eke out their revenge, a third party is always the sufferer in a comic way. The chums then decide to meet upon "the field of honor" and to prepare for their sword crossing each one visits a separate wine shop and consumes considerable of the best liquor in the house. They meet, but by now they have become too intoxicated to know the difference between a cane and a sword. The attempt at sword fighting with canes is ludicrous and, at last, seeing the futility of further fighting they join arms and go into a nearby cafe to drink a toast to one another's health. The scenes in which the men are shown intoxicated are funny and cannot leave an impression of repugnance in the minds of an audience. Length, 410 feet.

S. PHO (Pineschi).—The story of Sapho is laid in the Grecianera and Sapho is depicted as a wealthy woman of that period who has a host of admirers and a still greater host of maid servants who worship her. She is first seen playing the instrument which was most popular in her day—the lyre—in her sumptuous apartments, surrounded by her maids. She receives a bunch of posies from an ardent admirer, but when he enters upon the scene she rejects him. She leaves her home and wanders through the beautiful country about the place, singing an extemporaneous song, as she plays upon her lyre. She finally wanders to the sea coast and watches a party of fishermen as they land in their small boat. She falls in love with one of their number, but finds, to her utter dismay, that he prefers a sweetheart among the common people of his country. She is disconsolate, and all that her doting maids can do to cheer her is of no avail. The film finally ends in her suicide upon the rocky coast. The manufacturers believe this to be one of their strongest films and one that should prove popular among those exhibitors desiring the best in film production. Length, 574 feet.

A CLEVER DETECTIVE (Ambrosio).—An example of canine intelligence which is little demonstrated in this fashion in America, but which is well known and well depended upon in Europe, not only by the Monks of the Alps, but by some of the leading police departments of the continent, in many of which a full squad of dogs are regularly engaged and are placed upon the pay rolls as assistants to the detective and police forces. The first scene shows a number of friends in a business conversation at an al fresco cafe. A thief overhears their talk and learns that one of their number carries some valuable papers. The thief follows this man as he leaves his friends and, in a lonely place, waylays him and escapes with the papers. A dog appears and discovering his master's condition starts off for home to notify others. He is seen running through the fields, over hills and through the city streets, and finally arrives home, where he arouses the family and servants. He then leads the way back to the victim of the assault, who is carried home. The next scene is placed some time later. The victim is seen with his arm in a sling, talking to a friend on a busy city street. The dog is lying peacefully at his heels. The thief passes by, in the crowd. The dog scents him and follows him to his home, then returns to his master and urges his master to go back with him. The master goes, and there, finding the thief, has him arrested. Length, 460 feet.

STRATAGEM REWARDED (Wrench).—A beach scene. Two men are rivals for a summer girl. She flirts with the one man and decides to go bathing with the second. But the disappointed lover follows the pair to the bathing wagon—a sort of bath house on wheels which is not familiar in this country, but which is in much favor abroad—and he watches them as the man goes into one half of the wagon which bears the number 12, while the woman goes into the other half, which bears the number 13. Soon the pair appear in their bathing suits and are later seen disporting themselves in the sea. Then the woman comes from the water and enters her correct apartment in the bath wagon, which is number 13. The rival lover appears and changes the numbers on the doors, and when the lover arrives he endeavors to enter apartment 13, which under the change of numbers is now number 12. He is immediately ejected and the police are called. He leads them a merry chase down the beach, and when the woman finally appears, robed for the street, the rival who has played the trick greets the summer girl and receives her approbation. The film is clean comedy and should find much favor. Length, 265 feet.

LONGING FOR GOLD (Lux).—The story of a domestic play which is all too frequent in everyday life. Two poverty stricken lovers are shown in the home of the father of the girl. The father disapproves the match as he desires his daughter should marry a man of wealth. The lovers accept this decree as best they might, and the man starts off to a foreign country determining to amass a fortune and return to claim his sweetheart's hand. A sad parting scene is shown at the dock of the departing steamer. The lover goes away. The sweetheart and her father return to their lonesome home.

The lover is next shown in a mining camp where he, among a crowd of men, is digging for gold. One man of the party owns the claim. He leaves the men and starts for his cabin, but is waylaid by a crowd of outlaws who would kill him and are about to steal his deeds from him when they are killed by the hero of the story. The hero then carries the man, but is too late to save his life as the man is mortally wounded. As he draws his dying breath he makes his young benefactor the owner of all his mining property. At that time the claim was not supposed to be valuable but in the next scene an immense vein of gold has been located and the young man becomes very rich. His head is turned by his wealth. He goes to Paris and taking a fine residence, entertains lavishly. Suddenly, as he is making love to one woman of the gay party an apparition of his old sweetheart appears and he is thus reminded of his vow to marry her. A scene is then given of his sweetheart in her home. Her father dies and she, broken hearted and penniless, is driven out of the home. She seeks the house of her old sweetheart and falls fainting upon his steps. She is carried into the mansion where the guests make fun of her. They are driven out by her old lover, who, asking forgiveness, is granted it. Length, 689 feet.

OUR BANANA SUPPLY (Warwick).—The scenes of this remarkable picture were taken in the Central America State of Costa Rica, which is famous as the world's supply house of the succulent banana. The first scene shown is that of a number of negroes cutting "suckers" from tall banana trees, which are to be planted to create a new crop. Next is shown the dexterous manner in which two natives, with their peculiar knives in each hand, can wade through and cut down the undergrowth in a banana plantation. Next a scene is given showing how bananas are cut from the trees. Then they are loaded upon tram cars and are inspected by the superintendent of the plantation. The "dinky" engine used to draw these loaded tram cars through the picturesque palm-grown country known as Costa Rica will be a revelation to the average man of civilization who knows nothing but the big locomotive of modern times. The trip from the plantation to the point where the bananas are loaded upon freight cars to be carried to the boats for shipment is decidedly interesting, laid out as it is, through thickly grown forests of tall palms and tropical foliage. How bananas are loaded upon the steamers is another interesting view of this comparatively unknown industry. A scene is then given of one of the largest cities of civilization showing how great the demand is for this Central American fruit. Length 463 feet.

American Talent American Scenery American Productions Absolutely

One Reel a Week—REGULAR RELEASE DAY, FRIDAY

Do not fail to see our all American films. Remember we are by no means amateurs in the business, having secured the best talent to pose for our pictures. Photography of quality, scenery unexcelled, using modern facilities which enable us to produce pictures of durability, steadiness and high class workmanship. All our film is tinted and toned throughout.

First Release, Friday, May 21st—DISINHERITED SON'S LOYALTY

DISINHERITED SON'S LOYALTY.—Jack .and Tom the two sons of a retired merchant. Tom induces the old man to disown Jack through false statement of his character, thereby securing the signature of his father to paper, turning over his entire wealth and property to him. His father now has nothing and lives with him, and when Tom is married the poor old dad is always in the way, and is turned out by Tom, and is about to be sent to the Poor House, when through a messenger his son Jack is informed of the action, and is in time to save his father, whom he finds praying at his wife's grave. Jack who has prospered after 5 years, and is now the owner of a saw mill, takes the old man in an automobile to his own home, where he is cared for and loved during his remaining years. APPROXIMATE length, 887 feet.

Second Release, Friday May 28th—ROMANCE OF A FISHERMAID

ROMANCE OF A FISHERMAID.—Grace, the daughter of Captain Miles, is loved by Weed. Jenning, a pretended friend and wealthy City chap is also in love with Grace, lures her to a lonely hut, attacks her, and to save her honor she fights Jennings and escapes through a window, breaking the glass with a chair. Jennings swears vegeance on both she and Weed. He meets Weed, draws Weed's own knife and tries to kill him, and places the knife in the possession of another. Later is shown where Jennings is taken into the custody of the police and proven the guilty party. Weed then wins the girl.

This picture shows scenery of the arrival of a merry fishing party on a sail boat anchoring at the landing, and entering Captain Miles' house.

We might add that this is one of the best pictures of its kind ever shown. APPROXIMATE length, 789 feet.

Third Release, Friday, June 4th—"DAVY" CROCKETT IN HEARTS UNITED

DAVY CROCKETT—IN HEARTS UNITED.—"Davy" Crockett, whose motto was "Be Sure You're Right, Then Go Ahead." Story opens with Davy's home. Next we see Blake and Anna, who arrive to have saddle girth mended. Davy a backwoods man mends girth, while the young lady reads a poem of young Lochinvar to him. They fall in love with each other. Later Davy's see storm arising, and follows them. They are about to be lost in the storm, when Davy rescues them from the wolves, after finding them exhausted.

Later is shown where Anna is about to be married on the lawn of her Father's house to Blake, whom she now hates, when Davy rides in, grabs Anna, pulls her on the horse and rides away to a Country parson's house, marries Anna, takes her home to his own Cabin, and says, "Mother, I have brought you a Daughter. APPROXIMATE length, 836 feet.

GREAT WESTERN DRAMA

"THE FLIRT"

A TALE OF THE PLAINS

Shipped from New York, May 24, 1909

This film has the unique distinction of being highly sensational, and yet clothed with a moral, that will rank it with the best of efforts emanating from the pulpit; in fact, a story acceptable to man, woman or child, in any walk of life. This production is from the pen of a prominent American Author, and it enjoys the tribute of being a most able photographic reproduction of the sentiments of its author.

Guaranteed equal to anything ever seen in Europe or America. Photographically, Scenic, Action, Composition, never surpassed.

THE HUMAN APE

OR

Darwin's Triumph

Length about 548 Feet

This is the greatest illustration of animal intelligence ever given in a film. The ape behaves exactly like a man in every way—wears a man's clothes, eats, drinks and smokes (lighting his own cigarettes), dresses and undresses himself, plays cards, roller skates, rides a cycle with a degree of skill possessed by few human beiugs, in each case behaving without prompting, exactly as if he were a human being.

We have secured the rights of publication of this subject at a big figure, and it can only be obtained of us.

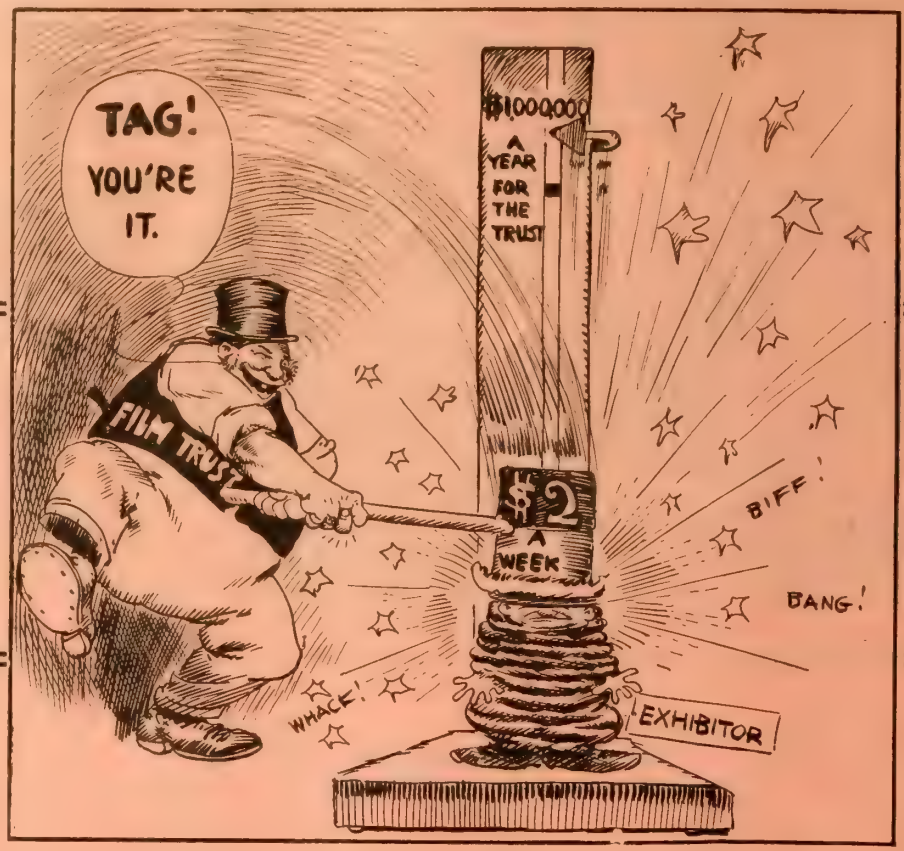
LAEMMLE'S PICTURE PUZZLE: "Find the licensed exhibitor."



PARDON ME but have you paid $2 for a license to get stung this week?

Here's something I don't like to say but it goes just the same:--I have already had to refuse to serve several customers in small towns because I have all the customers I can serve in those particular localities. I hesitated to say this because it sounds like one of the film trust's notorious bulldozing threats. I don't mean it that way. I simply tell it to show you that the independent movement is a veritable whirlwind and that you ought to get in now while the getting is good. After one week of good, honest independent pictures, you wouldn't think of going back to the kind you're using now. I've got the goods, whether you want American or European, and once you flash them in your house you'll make your licensed competitors look silly. Cut out the license nonsense. Don't imagine that the trust will be content with $2 a week. The men who are running the trust think you are rolling in money. They don't know how hard some of you have to scramble to make both ends meet. They figure that if you will stand for the $2 a week game, pretty soon you'll stand for $5 a week and then $10 a week. The minute they find that you can't get independent films because your territory is already taken by your competitors, they'll milk you to a fare-ye-well And if you are shrewd enough to run a successful moving picture business, then you are shrewd enough to know that I am peddling out the honest truth no matter whom it hits!

Released May 31st, 1909

What Drink Did

A Powerful Moral Lesson in Biograph Pictures

This is a most interesting subject with a strong moral. It shows how easy it is for a man to fall into intemperance through the thoughtless invitation of his friends.

One drink starts him on the downward path, making a veritable brute of him; failing to realize his loathsome sinister condition until during a saloon brawl he is the cause of the death of his own child.

Length, 913 Feet

Released June 3rd, 1909

Eradicating Aunty

A very funny comedy in which a newly married couple is enabled to rid themselves of the odious presence of Aunty and her friend, the Minister, with the assistance of a theatrical comedian friend. The situations are extremely funny, yet logical.

Length, 545 Feet

His Duty

One of the strongest short dramatic subjects yet produced, depicting the story of a young policeman whose duty it became to arrest his own brother for burglary.

"The Cripple's Marriage"

Comedy. Approximate Length, 522 Feet.

The principal characters of this remarkable comedy hit are a cripple minus his legs, and a tall spinster. The cripple falls in love with the lady but is scorned by her. His devotion is so great, however, that he performs a very daring feat, which argument is so strong that her objections are overcome and she consents to a speedy marriage. The wedding march, the court room scene, the supper and the return to the new home are all features bound to create boundless hilarity.

"The Good Omen"

Comedy. Approximate Length, 413 Feet.

Mistletoe has ever been the emblem of good luck and from time immemorial the branch of mistletoe has been the hope of the fair sex. In this series of views the spell is broken and in quick succession one catastrophe follows another to the utmost consternation of the peddler and his many patrons, who lose all faith in the proverbial advantages of the plant. Many very amusing scenes are created—bound to please everybody.

"Saved from Conviction"

RELEASE, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1909.

Drama. Approximate Length, 812 Feet.

A Strong Feature Subject

The woodman engaged at his labor meets with an accident, suffering a cut on his hand. His son bringing the noonday meal to him is spreading the lunch while the father goes to the creek to wash his hand. During his absence a tramp steals the ax and through threats prevents the boy from making an outcry.

The accident to the father's hand is worse than at first appeared to be the case and he returns to his home with the boy.

Soon after it is discovered that the town collector has been felled and robbed. The weapon with which the crime was committed is found on the ground and proves a clue to the murder. The woodman denies all knowledge or participation in the affair, but the accident to his hand, the blood on his trousers, all are taken as circumstantial evidence upon which a case is built up and vigorously prosecuted. The woodman's son has faith in his father and goes to Paris to appeal to the higher authorities. No one takes interest in the little fellow's troubles and tired and discouraged he lies down on a park seat to rest. He is rudely awakened by the police and a number of sympathetic people gather to hear his story and among them the sharp eye of the lad detects the disguised features of the man who stole his father's ax. He makes the accusation and the man is taken into custody. At the station they find other evidence on his person that he is guilty of the crime charged to the woodman. The police telephone the home town of the boy and the Prefect rushes into the court room just as the judge is about to pass sentence upon the innocent, convicted prisoner.

"Tender Cords"

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1909.

Drama. Approximate Length, 628 Feet.

The little daughter of an artisan falls from a window and is killed. With the life of the child happiness also passes from the once cheerful and happy home. Relations become strained, the husband, disconsolate, seeks comfort in the flowing bowl and the heartbroken wife is thrown upon her own resources for a livelihood. The burden weighs heavily upon the woman and she is finally compelled to seek separation. The couple conclude to divide the household effects and are assorting the clothes when an argument over the garments of the dead child touches the tender heart-strings of both, and anger once more gives way to love. The estranged are reunited and the memory of the departed hovers about the home like a dove of peace.

Perfect dramatization and photographic quality.

"Magic Carpet"

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1909.

Magic. Approximate Length, 357 Feet.

Amusing and entertaining throughout. The opening scene is in the Orient, and shows the Turk seated on a carpet, which magically carries him through the air to his destination. A vagrant steals the carpet and for his folly is scared almost to death by the magic powers exerted upon him. Numerous very exciting experiences are made by the police, a maid, and others before the carpet again comes into possession of the Turk, who, greatly elated, soars away on his inanimate and magic steed.

Some very bewildering effects are produced and everyone will be pleased with the entire persentation.

Glass Plates for Moving Pictures.

Celluloid, as a substitute for glass, long ago established itself in both stationary and moving picture photography, and now, startling as it may look, glass is talked of as a substitute for celluloid in the latter class of work. Recently we had an inquiry as to the feasibility of some such system. A manufacturer complained to us that the cost of making moving pictures in celluloid was exceedingly high, the risks of failure many, and, above all, the possible accidents from fire so great that the hazards of the business far outweighed and outnumbered its reasonable chances of success. The matter was put to us in all seriousness, and at this moment we are aware of experiments being made with the object of bringing about the substitution of sheet glass both in the making of the negatives and positives for moving pictures instead of rollable celluloid.

No doubt to many this will come in the nature of a great surprise, especially to those who have come into the business during the last two or three years. It will, therefore, be news to them, and probably to others older in the moving picture field, that the glass plate has actually been used for the making of the negative and the positive in moving pictures by L. Kamm, an ingenious mechanician, who is still engaged in the business. The results we saw some years ago were distinctly promising. We do not think that the idea is actually being employed in practice at the present time, but it is perfectly feasible, as was demonstrated. It is obvious that if you could make your moving picture in a series of parallel rows on a large glass plate and from that negative make a positive and devise a suitable mechanical means for projecting the rows of little pictures, you would immensely cheapen the cost of production. In Mr. Kamm's invention, which was for moving picture spiral cameras and projectors, the plate was intermittently rotated by a screw and traversed by a cog on the end of its axle rolling along a rack as the plate rotated. If we remember aright, the pictures were made on 10 by 12 glass plates, and the results shown on the screen were excellent.

It has escaped general attention in this connection that some years ago Nelson, who, we believe, was an American inventor, also devised a spiral camera for the same purpose as Kamm. The plate was contained in a light-tight case having the lens midway on its vertical line. In other words, it looked like an ordinary box camera with a lens on its front and the crank or turner at the side. In this system the plate was moved from right to left across the lens by means of a screw on the driving shaft. At the same time it was intermittently rotated through a broken screen and the result of these combined movements was the projection on the plate of a spiral series of small views; roughly, we will say about one-eighth of the size of an ordinary single picture on a celluloid film.

Of course, the dimension of the plate limited the number of views on them. For example: On a 10 by 12 plate you would only get 240 pictures of half-inch size. But, then, this would be no barrier to the continuous projection of any number of plates of a moving picture subject. Roughly, a dozen 10 by 12 negative plates and a dozen 10 by 12 positive plates would give you the equal of a very long film; you would have many, many hundreds of small pictures on them.

An obvious difficulty suggests itself, namely, that of enlarging these small pictures. Theoretically there should be no more difficulty in enlarging to the proper size a half-inch picture than there is about a one-inch picture, provided that the original definition of both is excellent. It all depends upon the picture and the optical system employed. Anybody familiar with the projection of microscopic objects on the screen will know what this means. By way of illustration we will refer to Mr. Martin Duncan's celebrated Microkinematographic specimens of very minute organisms, hardly perceptible to the eye in the moving picture positive, and yet showing clearly on a 20 to 30-foot screen in a London hall.

In this article we have endeavored to answer the inquiries of several of those interested in moving picture work who have asked us whether it is feasible to employ an ordinary glass plate camera for the work. It isn't, of course. But it is well within the powers of some clever inventor to so adapt the lateral and intermittent movement of the plate behind the lens which will give a series of views on one plate that when projected by a similar system will show high class moving pictures on the screen produced at a fraction of the cost of pictures made on roll celluloid.

We publish this week some important news items regarding the position of the Patents Company towards the alleged infringers of its patent rights. For some time past much natural curiosity has been shown as to when the company would proceed to vindicate those rights by legal means. The first step was taken last week and a preliminary injunction has been obtained against one company. In all, so far as can be ascertained, there are about twelve other manufacturers open to the same legal process. The other documents which we publish are copies of letters signed by the Company's attorneys and patent lawyers to these twelve companies. These letters amount to a warning, of which, no doubt, proper notice will be taken. The publication of these news items sets at rest many doubts which were quite natural in the circumstance that the company has been in existence five months before taking legal action. However, the latest development of matters certainly clears the air.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

CHAPTER XII.

Photographing Outdoor Subjects. (Continued.)

Not the least interesting of the outdoor subjects of which moving pictures may be made are those which deal with natural history. Last week I specified street scenes and outdoor views generally. Now I come to a department—animal life—which never fails to excite wonderment and interest. I mean, of course, animal life in all its phases. We have only to realize how popular the Great Northern Company's picture of the "Copenhagen Zoo" was to get an idea of the wide field open to the moving picture maker in this respect. Then Mr. Selig's very attractive picture of "Hunting Big Game in Africa": part of this ingenious production, shows us the noble lion in what seems to be his natural surroundings. It is rare, indeed, that one has the opportunity of sitting in a theatre and looking upon such a photograph as this. Still more remarkable, perhaps, is bird life in moving pictures, made by the Brothers Kearton. These clever naturalistic photographers some little while ago succeeded in making an absolutely noiseless moving picture camera. With this they penetrated to the remote haunts of some of the rarer fowl of the country. They actually succeeded in making moving pictures of birds in their nests—birds in fact living their own life unaware of the proximity of human beings. This must be regarded as a great feat in moving picture work. It demonstrates at once the possibilities open to really clever operators, and at the same time offers the public some idea of the many subjects that skill and ingenuity can obtain for their amusement.

Mr. Roosevelt's sporting expedition to Africa attracted to that country a friend of my own, A. R. Dugmore, probably the best photographer of animals in the world. His work has recently appeared in Collier's. I am sure that if Mr. Dugmore realized the value that would be attached to moving pictures of the interesting fauna he has photographed he would have gone provided with a moving picture camera. An instrument of this kind probably figures in the baggage of the ex-President—at any rate it is to be hoped that this opportunity is not to be missed. Wild animal photography demands a combination of skill, nerve and knowledge rarely possessed by the ordinary crank turner, but when it can be exercised, and successfully, the high value of the results should bring great money rewards. Some of our manufacturers might, with advantage, keep their eyes open for opportunities such as I have mentioned. But, to come nearer home and to choose less hazardous opportunities for making moving pictures, such places as the New York Bronx Zoological Park offers many comparatively easy opportunities. When an aquarium is found, as in the splendid building down at the Battery, the opportunity should not be neglected. Photography of fish in an aquarium is difficult but not impossible.

Such subjects as horse races, rowing, athletic games and the like were mentioned last week. There are also fish, birds, reptiles, insects and other ferae naturae—the whole of the animal, bird and insect kingdom. For example, at my hand as I write this is a circular from that enterprising firm, the Warwick Trading Company, advertising a very unique series of pictures. This is called "The Bees' Eviction." It shows, by means of moving picture photography, seven views of a farm, illustrating the eviction of the bees from an old house and their removal to a new home. Do you not think that if this picture was shown on a screen in any moving picture theatre in the country it would greatly interest an audience? I most certainly do. There should be great scope for this and similar kinds of work in place of the somewhat senseless subjects which form the staple moving picture entertainment.

Of course, as I have pointed out, all this kind of work demands a higher order of intelligence than that of merely turning a handle in front of a pre-arranged scene. A moving picture man must, indeed, be something of a specialist to be able to photograph it properly. Your naturalistic photographer in stationary work is usually something of a naturalist, etc. So it should be in moving picture work, but the talent is to be had on due inquiry, as is amply demonstrated by some projections that are shown in this country. A common subject not often dealt with, but one with a never-ending interest to the public, is life on a farm or on land where fruit and flowers are under cultivation. Life in the fields is comparatively easy to photograph, and, when shown on the screen, especially if there is interwoven in that life a real human story, as the Kalem Company so very cleverly prove for us week by week, most fascinating food for the moving picture camera is offered. One of the most interesting series we can call to mind illustrated Canadian life and scenery—harvesting, salmon spearing, lumber cutting and handling, and generally the outdoor life of the great Dominion. These pictures, though professedly taken for the purpose of attracting emigrants to Canada, yet interest a general audience.

The reader will perceive in this short chapter that I have endeavored to point out the uses of the moving picture camera in depicting outdoor life and costumes. Of course I have in mind the inculcation, on the part of the users of the camera, of a desire to take advantage of the opportunities that lie, as it were, at their very doors. It is not necessary to go to Africa to find suitable subjects; they literally abound at all points of this country. Nor are the past chapters of this series addressed to the manufacturers alone. There must be, aside from the manufacturers, many users of moving picture cameras who could take such subjects as I have referred to when opportunity offers. Then the negatives could find their way into the hands of the manufacturers in the ordinary manner. By these means the public, chiefly on whose behalf I am writing, would have an opportunity of seeing the life of their native country shown on the screen.

It does not appear to be generally known that in New York there is a law which limits the seating capacity of newly erected moving picture theaters. You cannot build a place which seats more than 299 persons. This, on the face of it, is absurd. Of course, such a law clearly calls for amendment. But how is this to be brought about? The only representative body in New York City is the Exhibitors' Association, which is doing good work. If this Association were more numerously and better supported, then the law might be changed—if it is desirable to change it. It is a common reproach that New York does not possess such handsome and commodious moving picture theaters as other cities. This may be the explanation. You can build an ordinary talking theater at which all the putrescent immorality of debased minds and bodies can be presented to thousands, but you are debarred from building a theater with which the moral, cleanly and elevating moving picture can be shown to as many people, which, as Euclid observes, is absurd.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

FUSES.

As has been stated, the electric current generates heat by electrical friction as it passes through the wires. A short circuit, ground or overload, might cause such large quantities of current to flow as would heat the conductor red hot, thus causing innumerable fires, or an excess of current might burn out large numbers of incandescent filaments were it not for the protection afforded by what is called the "fuse." This latter is a short piece of soft metal possessing very high conductivity (current carrying capacity), but which fuses (melts) at about the same temperature as does lead, of which metal it is largely composed. Hence, inserting a short piece of fuse wire in a circuit protects both lamps and wires from excess of current since the instant the current flow increases above the capacity of the fuse it "blows out" (melts), thus automatically breaking the circuit and stopping all flow of current until a new fuse has been installed, which cannot be done until the cause of excess has been removed. It follows, however, that the size of fuse used on any given circuit must be proportionate to the current used on that circuit. To install a six-ampere fuse on a circuit carrying but three amperes would not protect the lamps or circuit except to a limited extent, the lamps practically not at all. To install a fuse of greater carrying capacity than the wires it is designed to protect would be almost as bad as installing none at all. It is not desirable, however, to put in fuses barely large enough to carry the current flow of a given circuit, since, if this is done, there is likely to be excessive and needless blowing of fuses, but it must be borne in mind that fuses ordinarily will carry about 20 per cent. overload. In the smaller fuses it is well to allow just a little leeway over even this, but not too much. Use common sense and judgment. The lamps and wires must be fully and adequately protected, still there is such a thing as excess of caution. The writer knows of nothing in this wide world not capable of being overdone. The novice will do well to proceed carefully in this matter, however, until he knows just exactly what he is doing. He would better be too safe than not safe enough. In time he will learn just how far he may go without encountering the danger signal. There are several types of fuses in common use besides plain fuse wire, which latter is simply attached between the binding posts the same as you would a piece of copper wire. Before going further, let me caution you on one point: never, under any circumstances, put a piece of copper wire, or anything else but the proper size fuse, in place of a fuse that has blown out! Have an ample supply of extra fuses at all times. When a fuse on an independent circuit blows out it is a pretty certain indication that something is wrong. If you install another and it blows as soon as you close the switch you may begin to hunt for a ground or short circuit at once.

Fig. 9 shows two types of what is commonly known as "cartridge" fuses. These are reliable, quickly and easily installed and emit no visible flash when they blow out. They are in every way excellent. Fig. 10, A, shows the "Link" fuse, which is installed by simply compressing the hooks under the binding post screws. This type is an excellent, inexpensive operating room fuse. Fig. 10, B, shows the "plug" fuse and receptacle, the whole being commonly known as a "plug cut-out." This form of fuse is in very general use and is most excellent for circuits of moderate capacity, say not exceeding ten amperes. For heavier current he prefers one of the other types, though the plugs are made to carry as much as fifty amperes. They are easily and quickly installed, and the contacts are excellent. Be sure, however, that you screw the plug in tight. There is no possibility of fire from this type, as the fuse wire is entirely enclosed by the brass, or mica, cap. Switches may be had with this type of fuse receptacle if desired. All things considered, this type is perhaps best to install on your switchboard unless you care considerably about extra fine appearance, in which case Fig. 9 style might be preferred. Plug and cartridge fuses are the only ones which should be allowed on a stage.

The operating room projection lamp circuit is a thing to itself. It is subject to heavy and frequent fluctuations of current and must be fused accordingly. There is absolutely nothing about a projection arc lamp which momentary excess of current, within reasonable limits, can in the least injure. The writer uses No. 6 wire for his operating room projection circuit and fuses with fifty ampere fuses. He has never experienced the slightest trouble through so doing. Of course, where lighter wires are used, a smaller fuse must be installed. A good rule is "fuse ten amperes over the current you pull under normal conditions." Be careful, however, that the main house fuses (fuses attached to main house switch) are equal in capacity to all circuit fuses, plus your operating fuses, else they might blow and leave everything in darkness. Link fuses (Fig. 10, A) are excellent for operating fuses, as they are cheap and easily installed.

When using plug or cartridge fuses promptly throw them away when they blow out. They are of no more use to you or any one else, and, if they get mixed with the good ones, it simply causes aggravation. Keep the various sizes separate and the whole lot in some handy place near the switchboard.

Be sure and have your fuse connections tight. Loose connections heat and very little heat will melt a fuse. A dirty contact is equivalent to a loose one.

WIRE SYSTEMS.

There are two wire systems in general use in incandescent lighting, viz.: the multiple arc and the three-wire. But there are two others occasionally encountered, viz.: the multiple series and series multiple. To this must be added the high potential system, which is, in practical use, a multiple arc. What is known as a series arc system is used exclusively in arc lighting and is of no interest to the operator except that he be able to know it when he sees it, so that he will let it severely alone. A projection arc lamp cannot be connected into this system under any conditions.

In the following diagrams the circle represents the dynamo and the X lamps; + indicates positive and — negative.

Fig. 11 is a diagram of the series arc system. This system carries about fifty volts pressure for each lamp in the circuit. A twenty-lamp circuit would have about 1,000 volts pressure. Each lamp must carry the entire pressure and all the current, which latter seldom exceeds ten amperes. You cannot connect a projection arc lamp to this system under any circumstances.

Fig. 12 is a diagram of the multiple arc system of wiring, illustrating the method of connecting a projection lamp thereto. You may connect in anywhere, simply attaching one wire to one wire of the light circuit and the other wire to the opposite, being sure that the wires, switches, fuses, meters, etc., are large enough to carry your current. Before connecting ascertain the voltage of course, and arrange the amount of your rheostat resistance accordingly. In practice lamps are not usually attached between the main wires, as is shown in the illustration. Light circuits are run from the mains, as shown, and are called "service circuits."

Fig. 13 shows the three-wire system, which is used mainly for direct current. In this system two dynamos are run in series, producing a pressure across the outer wires of 220 volts (usually) or a pressure of 110 volts between either the outer and center ("neutral") wire. As has been said, the main reason for the use of alternating current lies in the fact that it can be generated at high voltage, carried to the place desired at that pressure and there easily transformed to lower voltage. This cannot be done with direct, or at least it is not practical to do it. Direct current is to be preferred,but for this one objection that the three-wire system was evolved as a means of carrying relatively large quantities of direct current electro-motive force without prohibitive wiring cost. The diagram shows two methods of attaching a projection lamp to this system. In one we attach to the two outer wires and will get the full series pressure of the two dynamos, usually (practically always) 110-volt machines, which will be 220 volts, and we must provide rheostat resistance for that pressure. The other and usual method is to attach to the center (neutral) and one outer wire, which gives us the pressure of one dynamo, usually 110 volts. Incandescent service circuits are run by attaching to one outer and the neutral wires and using 110-volt lamps. Service circuits may be attached to the two outer wires, however, by using 220-volt lamps, but it is not desirable to do so, since the high resistance lamp is not so efficient. In this system the center wire is called the neutral, and is both positive and negative. In practice the service circuits are run from both sides and kept as evenly balanced as is practical. The lamps of the circuits on the two sides burn in series, and the neutral only carries current equal to the difference in the load on the opposite sides. If the load of the opposite sides is evenly balanced there will be no current at all flowing in the neutral. It is possible, therefore, for the fuse of the neutral main to blow without affecting the lights of the system at all. As a matter of fact, however, it is seldom or never that a system is thus evenly balanced. You may cut your projection lamp in on any service circuit, which is heavy enough to carry the load by simply attaching, as instructed for Fig. 12 system. You may also attach direcly to the mains if desired.

Fig. 14 is a diagram of the multiple series system of wiring, not much in use, however. In this system a very considerable range of voltage is possible, the lamps being burned in series. Ascertain the voltage of the lamps by looking at the tag pasted on them and multiply the voltage of the lamp by the number of lamps in the series, and the product will be the total voltage carried by the mains. Thus, if you find the lamps are 110-volt and there are two in series multiply 110 by 2. If there are five 50-volt lamps in a series multiply 50 by 5 for the line voltage, etc. You may attach a projection arc lamp, as shown, by providing rheostat resistance according to the line voltage.

SERIES MULTIPLE.

The series multiple system is a very bad form of wiring and is so little in use that it is hardly worth while describing. A projection arc lamp may easily be connected to it.

HIGH POTENTIAL ALTERNATING SYSTEM.

The high potential system is a two-wire system, in effect the same as the multiple arc system. It is always alternating and the mains carry pressure from 2,000 to as high as 20,000 volts, usually about 2,000, however. With the mains we have nothing at all to do, since they must be handled only by an expert electrician. Never attempt to touch, handle or meddle in any way with the mains of a high tension system, unless you hanker to reach the hereafter by a very expeditious route.

In this system there is what is called a "primary" and a "secondary" current. The current on the mains is high tension, but is, by means of a transformer (Fig. 15), reduced for commercial use, usually to 110 volts. The secondary current is taken from the secondary coils of the transformer on two wire service circuits, which are the same as the multiple arc system (Fig. 12), and your connections are made exactly the same as directed for that system. A full explanation of the transformer will be given under the head of "Resistance Devices" further on, but for the benefit of road operators and showmen the following instructions are given:

Fig. 15 shows a transformer attached to a pole. That is where you will usually find them. 1—1 are the high tension wires, which you must, on no account, touch since they will probably be charged with a pressure of at least 2,000 volts. 2—2 are the secondary wires, carrying usually 110 volts, to which you may attach your arc lamp wires. A—A are the fuse boxes, sometimes set in the sides of the transformer and sometimes, as in this case, isolated. The fuses are carried in iron plugs, which may be pulled or screwed out. For ordinary service circuits these fuses will be very small. The reason is this: they carry high tension current, being located between the mains and the transformer. One ampere of current at 2,000 volts becomes about 10 amperes after it is reduced to 110 volts pressure, so that a three-ampere transformer fuse on a 2-000-volt system will carry what will become 30 amperes at 110 volts after passing through the transformer. In many places it will be found that the wires entering the building (ofttimes a church) where the show is to be given are not large enough to carry projection arc lamp current, and it will be necessary to run your own temporary transformer. First ascertain from the light company whether or not the transformer is large enough to carry your current plus whatever else it must take care of. This is important, since, if too small, you might burn it out and have to pay for it. Commercial transformers will stand a pretty heavy overload for two or three hours without damage, but this is easily overdone. Next, be sure that the transformer fuses are large enough to take care of your current plus the other load they must carry. These two points taken care of, you may climb the pole and attach your wires to the secondary wires (2—2, Fig. 15), just as close to the transformer as possible. If the machine is large enough to carry your load the secondary wires will not likely be smaller than No. 8 or No. 10, and either of these will carry your current for the few inches from where you attach to the transformer coils. Attach by stripping the insulation, scraping the wires perfectly clean and wrapping the well-cleaned ends of your wire around very tightly five or six times. Run your wires through your switch, fuses and rheostat to the lamp in the usual way. Of course this direction is for a temporary job, to use one or two nights only. Your wires may be supported on temporary insulators in any convenient, safe manner. If the wires running into the building are heavy enough you can attach to them just as you would to the multiple arc system (Fig. 12), but in all cases ascertain whether or not the transformer and its fuses are large enough or you may have trouble. A high-tension transformer is a dangerous thing to fool with, and unless you are very certain you know just what you are doing you had better let it severely alone. Sometimes, however, the operator on the road is practically forced to do these things, and the above directions may be of great assistance.

The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theaters.

By Wm. I. Sackheim.

CHAPTER II.

Last week I drew attention to the unsuitability of the average nickelodeon signs and the need for their improvement. But criticisms, no matter how just, are seldom of much material benefit. They usually create dissatisfaction and havoc. It is my purpose to try and lead you in the proper direction, and by a series of comprehensive, yet simple, hints, suggestions and illustrations to aid the most untalented to acquire a sufficient knowledge of the art of making signs to be of practical service.

The operator, usher, manager or other employee may add to his income, as well as enhance the appearance of the house he is connected with, by following the directions set forth in these articles. Before proceeding, let me correct an erroneous impression that sign writing requires special talent or ability.

It is true that the man with an inclination for art can master lettering more rapidly than the untalented. Still few artists are good letterers. The formation of the letters of the alphabet is purely a mechanical operation, and therefore perfection can only be acquired by study and practice.

Devote at least one-half hour to one hour each day to diligent practice and in two or three months you will be surprised at your own improvement. But if you have no liking for the work you had better not attempt it, for labor without love is merely a waste of energy. After becoming interested you will find the work very fascinating. Don't try to accomplish too much at the beginning. Content yourself with following the instructions to the minutest detail, though the lessons may appear simple. I intentionally made them so.

In my experience in teaching sign writing I have observed that the student usually wishes to paint a complete sign before he has mastered the formation of the letters or learned how to control his brush. As I cannot come in personal contact with every one who takes up this study, I must impress upon you the necessity of attempting no more than what I advise.

Signs for Moving Picture Theaters.

The rules that govern lettering in general apply to moving picture signs, but as the latter are seldom permanent, perfect or accurate work is not absolutely necessary. Grace, neatness and style are more essential. I do not mean to say that accuracy is not desirable. But do not sacrifice "snap" and artistic effects for perfect workmanship.

The signs should not appear "stiff" and stilted. Notice the theatrical lithographed posters that are pasted on your fences and you will get an idea of what your bulletin should look like. As moving picture signs serve a different purpose to the average sign, in that they are merely temporary announcements, they require different treatment. I have therefore devised a system of instruction and a series of alphabets especially for moving picture work.

Utensils.

The first thing necessary in starting the work is to provide yourself with the proper tools. These are not numerous. Build yourself a table to work upon. As professional show card and sign writers differ widely in the height and the tilt of their work tables, your individual taste and comfort should govern you in this matter. I have always found a flat table about 34 or 36 inches high, or one with a very slight tilt or slant to it, the most satisfactory for this class of work, which is similar to show card work. For lettering muslin flyers or large signs on oil cloth, wood, sheet iron or on the large bulletin boards in front of the theater, an upright position of the material will be found more advantageous. But as this branch of the work will be treated later further mention is unnecessary at present.

A large board, three or four feet in width and any desired length, placed upon two wooden horses will answer the purpose of a table. Next secure some white or manila wrapping paper for practice work. Some sticks of charcoal, with which to mark your lines, a yard stick, a T square, some turpentine, varnish, three or four brushes, and paint complete your outfit for the present.

The signs for moving picture theater boards are usually made on paper or cardboard and later tacked or pasted on the bulletin board. The beginner will find it rather difficult to paint upon the boards in an upright position. Therefore I advise the use of the flat table and the sheets of paper, and mounting the sign on the board after completion. Even professional letterers find this method the most practical. Colors ground in Japan, which can be purchased in any paint shop, will be found the simplest and best to use.

The brushes and method of using the paint I will describe in my next article.

PICTORIAL EFFECT IN MOVING PICTURES.

Last week we rebuked several writers for denying pictorial qualities to moving pictures. The writers who have taken up this proposition, as we pointed out, simply show their ignorance of the subject. It is with singular opportuneness, therefore, that we find amongst recent Gaumont films released by George Kleine a specimen which proves in every inch of film our contention that moving pictures of very high pictorial quality may be and are produced and are actually presented to the public. This is a lovely picture called the "Glories of Sunset." The photographer who made the exposure knew what he was about. For, though he is dealing with inanimate nature, he tells a very beautiful story indeed, and he tells it pictorially; that is, in a series of well-composed, well-chosen and well-photographed scenes. First of all we have the effect of twilight almost sensuously shown. One seems to feel indeed, in the words of the poet, "the shades of night are falling fast." Then we see the setting of the sun; next the last of his rays, and finally the picture ends by showing the sea bathed in moonlight. Precisely how these effects are made it is not necessary for us to specify. What we are concerned with are the results, and certainly this film is a very beautiful nature study, appropriately toned, no doubt, in development, and conveying to the spectator all the delightful impressions of the actual phenomena of sunset. In the whole world of nature nothing is more beautiful to look at than this. The film is a very fine bit of Gaumont photography, and Mr. Kleine should be busy in supplying the demand for it.

NEW PENNSYLVANIA BOOTH LAW.

A new law with respect to moving picture theatres comes into force in the State of Pennsylvania almost immediately. The three exempted cities are Pittsburg, Philadelphia and Scranton. The law requires that in future the booth in a moving picture theatre shall be constructed of fire-proof asbestos lumber, riveted to an asbestos iron frame. It is to have an automatic closing shutter, automatic closing door and must be provided with a ventilating pipe. Two shelves will be permitted in the booth for the use of the operator, and those shelves must be of special construction. The law further requires that there shall be a permanent booth for use in moving picture theatres and a portable booth to be used in churches, halls and by traveling exhibitors for occasional entertainments. It will be seen that this is a very important law, which we understand is to be vigorously enforced. Messrs. Williams, Brown and Earle, of 918 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., advise us that they are prepared to supply these asbestos lumber booths for moving picture theatres, and we recommend the owners or managers of these latter to enter into correspondence with Williams, Brown & Earle without delay. These booths are packed flat for shipment, and they can easily be erected by a skilled mechanic.

ACTORS SEE THEMSELVES ACT.

Manager Lawrence, of the Bijou Theater, Edmonton, Alta., Canada, writes us that the members of the Theodore Lorch Company, which are presenting the sketch "Flirtation" on a circuit, were his guests recently at a moving picture performance in which they saw themselves act. It appears that this company was employed by the Selig Polyscope Company last Summer when they produced "A Mountain Feud," "Shamus O'Brien" and other Selig films in Colorado. Mr. Lawrence learned that the company playing at the Orpheum had taken part in the production of these films and secured them from his rental agency, much to the gratification of the members of the Theodore Lorch Company.

The Patents Company and Its Rights.

IMPORTANT LETTERS TO ALLEGED INFRINGERS.

The following letters have been sent out by the legal representatives of the Patents Company to every unlicensed film user or projecting machine user in the United States.

The first letter issued and sent out on May 26th from the offices of Kerr, Page, Cooper & Hayward, Singer Building, New York City, has to do with the picture projecting machine and is as follows:

"We are informed that you are at the present time using a motion picture projecting machine which infringes one or more of the following United States Letters Patent owned by our client, the Motion Picture Patents Company of New York City:

"Patent No. 578,185 dated March 2, 1898.
"Patent No. 580,749 dated April 12, 1897.
"Patent No. 586,953 dated July 20, 1897.
"Patent No. 673,329 dated April 30, 1901.
"Patent No. 673,992 dated May 14, 1901.
"Patent No. 707,934 dated August 26, 1902.
"Patent No. 722,382 dated March 10, 1903.
"Patent No. 785,205 dated March 21, 1905.

"You are hereby notified that your use of this machine is in violation of the exclusive rights reserved to the Motion Picture Patents Company by the Letter Patents enumerated above, and that failure on your part to discontinue such use, or to obtain a license from the Company under the patents named, will subject you to a suit for an injunction and accounting for profits and damages arising from your infringement."

The second letter issued and sent out on May 26th is in reference to films.

"Law Offices: GIFFORD & BULL.
"Washington Life Building,
"141 Broadway, New York.

"We are advised by our client, the Motion Picture Patents Company, that you are using and have used motion pictures made in infringement of reissued United States Letters Patent No. 12,192, granted to Thomas A. Edison, January 12, 1904, and owned by it; and are requested to notify you that unless you forthwith cease such infringing acts, we are instructed to protect its exclusive rights under said patent by suits in the United States Courts for an accounting of the profits arising from such infringements and for an injunction to prevent the use of such motion pictures without the license of our client. Yours very truly,

"GIFFORD & BULL."

PATENTS COMPANY'S INJUNCTION AGAINST THE MUTOSCENE COMPANY.

The application for a preliminary injunction by the Motion Picture Patents Company against the Oklahoma Natural Mutoscene Company came up for hearing before Judge Wright in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on Friday, May 1, and on the affidavits and arguments presented by Melville Church, Esq., the counsel for the Patents Company, Judge Wright granted the injunction and signed an order restraining the Mutoscene Company from making, using or selling moving picture cameras in violation of the patent granted to Thomas A. Edison for such camera.

In view of this order this company will be in contempt of court if it should attempt to use the infringing camera anywhere within the United States, and undoubtedly the Patents Company will immediately press for a final decree and an accounting for damages sustained by it in this infringement of its rights.

Following is the text of the order granting a preliminary injunction against the Mutoscene Company, filed May 21, 1909:

"In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia—Motion Picture Patents Company vs. Oklahoma Natural Mutoscene Company. In Equity. No. 28,533.

"This cause coming on to be heard on complainant's motion for a preliminary injunction and on the affidavits of Frank L. Dyer, Thomas Armat and George F. Scull and the exhibits annexed to said affidavits in support of said motion, and on a certified copy of a decree of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York in the cause entitled Thomas A. Edison vs. American Mutoscope and Biograph Company, dated March 25, 1907, also exhibited in support of said motion, and on proof of service of said affidavits and decree upon the defendant herein, and having been argued by Melville Church, of counsel for complainant, and considered by the Court, it is now, by the Court, this twenty-first day of May, 1909, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said motion be and the same is hereby granted, and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that an injunction be issued out of this Court against the defendant, Oklahoma Natural Mutoscene Company, enjoining and restraining the said Oklahoma Natural Mutoscene Company, its officers, servants, agents, attorneys, employees, workmen and confederates, and each and every of them, until the further order of this Court, from directly or indirectly making, constructing, using, vending, delivering, working or putting into operation or use, or in anywise counterfeiting or imitating the invention set forth in the Letters Patent to Thomas A. Edison, reissue No. 12,037, dated September 30th, 1902 (as particularly claimed in Claims 1, 2 and 3 of said patent), referred to in the bill of complaint herein, and particularly from making, using or vending the apparatus (or any apparatus similar thereto), designated in the complainant's moving papers as the Warwick Camera, and described in detail in the affidavits of said Frank L. Dyer and Thomas Armat herein above referred to.

"WRIGHT, Justice."

FOOL LEGISLATION.

After September 1 it will be illegal in the State of New York to admit to a kinetoscope or moving picture show any child who is, or appears to be, under sixteen years of age. A New York paper in commenting upon the new act says that it is "a most desirable and salutary law." Perhaps. But a good many will take a different view of the subject. From our point of view it looks like the most asinine of all the numerous samples of fool legislation of modern times. The moving picture show can be mischievous, or it can be educational, just as the authorities of a town where one is in operation may decree. Many of these shows give scenes of life in foreign lands that are not only entertaining, but instructive. Sometimes a single set of these films will give the young person a better idea of a foreign country and its people than could be obtained by reading volumes of descriptive matter.

The moving picture show needs regulation undoubtedly. But instead of barring children out, these shows should be made clean enough so that every young person could receive benefit from attending them. Legislation that forbids the poor child from gaining information and amusement that may be found in the moving picture show, information that he would probably never be able to gain in any other manner, gives another evidence that the thirst for lawmaking has banished common sense from the heads of too many alleged statesmen these days.—Tribune.

THE MARSHAW SLIDE CO.

Half-a-dozen or more victims of the unbusinesslike methods of the Marshaw Slide Co. again tell us of their experiences this week. Mr. LeRoy Bickle, manager of the Theatorium, Ardmore, Okla., writes that he has before him a cancelled check cashed by them weeks ago, that he never received his slides and they "add insult to injury by ignoring his letters." We have had dozens of similar complaints against this company and shall continue to expose them until they square themselves in the eyes of the trade, as such practises discourage all mail order business.

We never advertised the Marshaw Slide Co., but we did accept the advertisement of the Driben Publishing Co., of Canada, before we were given a chance to examine their publications. As many of our readers have complained that they have been "buncoed," we offer to extend a year's subscription to the Moving Picture World to every subscriber who will return the books to us, provided that they ordered them through the advertisement that appeared in this paper.

"HALLBERG'S" NEW INCANDESCENT LAMP ECONOMIZER.

The great success of the Hallberg Economizer for moving picture lamps has led Mr. Hallberg to invent a new incandescent electric lighting system with a special economizer, by means of which users of electric signs and incandescent lamps in general can secure a saving of 75% on their electric bills. As has been the custom with all devices put out by Mr. Hallberg, this new system is fully guaranteed and full protection is given to the user of these devices.

Mr. Hallberg will exhibit his electric economizer, flaming arc lamps, spot lights, fans and new incandescent lighting system at the convention of the National Electric Light Association, of which he is a member, at Atlantic City during the coming week.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The smiling lady in the ticket booth of Mr. Jacobs' Bronx Theater, at the Southeast corner of Wendover and Park avenues, Bronx, refused my nickel the other evening when I called there, because she said she knew I was coming. Evidently, then, the fame of your critic has spread far and wide. I remonstrated with the lady for being such a bad business woman as to refuse money, but she was firm, and so I enjoyed the luxury of a free show. When it was all over and I was saying "Good-night" to her and Mr. Jacobs, she said more nice things about me, remarking that I was looking as if a Broadway theater was more in my line. But I "got back" by retorting that it was always a pleasure to me to visit a well-conducted moving picture house; which Mr. Jacobs' theater certainly is.

In the first place, it was specially built for the purpose so recently as last September, has seven exits, excellent seating accommodation, and plenty of room at the sides and in the center for moving about. Then, while the pictures are being shown there is a dichromic system of subdued illumination which makes the whole place light without detracting from the brilliancy of the picture.

Mr. Jacobs is personally in attendance most of the time, and he has the assistance of a uniformed officer, whose mission it is to keep order amongst the exuberant patrons of the house. The Bronx Theater is situated in a thickly populated district, which appears to be prolific in small children of diverse nationalities. These and their mothers, together with a few sprinkling of mere men, appear to form the average audience of the house. And with what rapt attention they follow the pictures on the screen! I sat like a human island entirely surrounded by a sea of small children, and while the entertainment was in progress I watched their little faces. They were a study in wonder and concentrated interest. The effect made upon their childish minds can only be surmised. I, for one, think it makes for the permanence of the moving picture as a settled form of amusement. For is it not true that what we like as children we mostly retain an affection for all through the various stages of our lives? What are we, after all, as Carlyle puts it, but "children of a larger growth"?

One of the principal items in the program was the Humanoscope, or talking photograph. There was a Selig picture of "Rip Van Winkle," and the people behind the screen talked and acted all through with such conviction that although I had seen it in many other forms, such as play, opera and condensed drama, the dear old story was just as fresh and absorbing to me as ever. And what was true of "Rip" the other night at the Bronx Theater was true of the other pictures shown. Everybody was deeply interested in them. And when a nice lady sang a nice song to a nice colored set of slides, why, we all joined in the chorus like a great family party!

There was a little feature the other evening which deserves special mention. On Tuesday evening of each week the ladies of the audience come provided with numbered tickets which entitle them to a chance for a prize that is offered. A small child draws the number from a basket, Mr. Jacobs calls it out, and if any lady present has a ticket corresponding to that number she signifies the same in the usual manner and is awarded the prize. This took place the other night, and, bless me, how pleased the woman looked to get her silver-mounted jugs! Upon my word, I quite envied her as she proudly stalked off with her prize. Thursday evening the gentlemen have their chance. Wonder if I shall draw the lucky number if I ever present myself at the Bronx Theater some evening? Think I should, Mrs. Ticket Office? As indicative of the able manner in which a moving picture theater can be conducted to please all reasonable demands in a crowded neighborhood of working people, the Bronx Theater deserves every commendation. If all the other moving picture theaters which I have visited in and around New York City were as well conducted as this, then there would be no call for the irrational and vexatious interference with the business that has recently taken place.

The Progressive Motion Picture Company is the successor of a film exchange called the "Twentieth Century Film Company," formerly located at Ogden, Utah. The Twentieth Century Film Company formerly held an exchange license issued by the Patents Company, and its successor, the Progressive Motion Picture Company, has been licensed by the Patents Company to conduct a licensed exchange at Ogden, Utah. Both of these exchanges have always been exclusively connected in the business of renting films and neither of them have ever manufactured motion pictures.

"JUDGMENT OF SOLOMON."

When a company essays to reproduce a scene from Biblical history which has become familiar through long continued description it requires actors with the highest possible conception of the actor's art and a comprehension of the impressions which have been made upon the minds of the people by these dramatic stories. In reproducing this reputed act of Solomon the Vitagraph Company undertook a very difficult task which was executed satisfactorily. It is the old familiar story of the judgment between the two claimants of the live child. The entire story is tense with dramatic interest, and, in the main, the actors have maintained this interest throughout the piece. The principal character, the real mother of the live child, is acted with fidelity and a comprehension of what a mother would do under such circumstances. Every motion, every facial expression is in accord with the character and deserves the highest praise. The other characters are good, but inasmuch as they are accessories, even Solomon himself being included in this description, they do not require separate criticism. To say that they perform their parts with sufficient fidelity to the story to make it clear expresses their part in the drama. The staging, which includes the costuming and the arrangement of palaces and accessories, is apparently in accord with the accepted understanding of what was used at that time. The entire picture is toned brown, which, in places, degenerates into plain gloom. This does not, however, mar the picture. On the contrary it supplies an element of mystery which adds to its attractiveness and increases the artistic effect. Brown lends itself admirably to this picture, but it would scarcely be advisable in others where a stronger light is required. The lighting is reasonably soft and even and shows evidence of careful study to secure the most artistic and pleasing effects. It is a pity that the picture cannot run longer. One day is inadequate for such an excellent piece of work.

MOVING PICTURES AS NATURE STUDIES.

This week the Great Northern Company released two subjects which merit special notice, less on account of their photographic qualities, which are excellent, than of the subjects. They deal with the animal kingdom. One of them is called the "Human Ape; or, Darwin's Triumph." The film shows how highly an ape can be educated. The one in this picture behaves so nearly like a man would in similar circumstances that it is hard to believe one is not looking upon the picture of a human being in the disguise of a simian. But we are not. We have seen educated apes before on the stage and have been impressed by the cleverness of their actions. This one is clothed like a man, eats like a man, drinks and smokes like a man, plays cards and cycles. He also undresses and puts himself to bed. His keeper or mentor is present all the time, but does not prompt the animal. It is really a very wonderful film, and it should please and interest wherever it is shown. Children, in particular, will appreciate it. The other Great Northern film is of greater sympathetic interest—at least, according to our taste—for it illustrates the maternal instinct in birds and animals, chiefly the latter. You see how the creatures watch over and tend their young. Is there anything so beautiful as the affection of a mother for her young? Women are proud of it, but they alone, it seems, do not have a monopoly of the maternal instinct. The cat, the dog, the horse, the rabbit, the fowl, the bird, the zebra, the elephant and others are here shown in their natural surroundings looking after their little ones in their own particular way. It is a pretty picture, cleverly conceived and skillfully carried out, and we think it will win applause wherever it is shown.

AN OLD RENTAL CONCERN, BUT PROGRESSIVE.

While Chicago is acknowledged the center of the Independent movement, the exchanges in that city licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Co. are not complaining relative to a lack of business. Messrs. Geo. K. Spoor Co. report an astounding increase in their business during the last couple of months and assure us that they are still staunch adherents to their well-known business policy of "The right film at the right price."

If it is possible to ascertain the worth of a principle from the results attained through a strict adherence to the same, we should say that the Spoor Company are on the right track.

They further inform us that in spite of extraordinarily keen competition rental prices are remaining substantially the same as before the advent of the Independent movement and that the rental business in their territory, generally considered, cannot be termed otherwise than satisfactory.

Notable Films of the Week.

BROTHERS IN ARMS. (Edison.)

Frankly, excellent as this picture is, we look upon it more as symptomatic of what is to follow it, and not as marking the top notch of possibilities that lie before the Edison Company. It is far away head of this company's recent productions, and yet here and there it falls short of that achievement which is easily within their grasp. We mean the absolute elimination of those little minor technical defects of white and dark spots and splashes which mar the excellence of a picture and which we think greater care in the work-rooms would prevent. The story of the picture is a simple one. It is that of two friends who parted after one of them had made a successful appeal to the heart of a girl whom they both love. They pass through some very stirring war experiences which must have cost the Edison Company a large sum of money, and no end of hard work, to rehearse and present. Indeed, when looking on these scenes wherein all the glory, all the excitement, and all the horrors of real war are graphically shown, one feels as if one was looking at an actual conflict. As time progresses one of the men, who has been made a captain, becomes a judge, the other a crippled tramp. The fate of the latter is to be arrested and brought before his one-time comrade-in-arms, not before, however, he has rescued the former's little daughter from death by drowning. Discovery at the trial in the court house opportunely occurs, and the judge sentences the prisoner to the best room in his house. The film ends by showing the reunion of all the principal characters. This story and the way in which it was worked seemed to please the audiences this week wherever it was shown. Dramatically it is perhaps not so closely knit as it might be, but this is a point which only the professional critic would remark. Photographically, too, as we have said, it is excellent, with the exception of the few blemishes which we have pointed out.

HUNTING BIG GAME IN AFRICA (Selig).

For topical interest this Selig picture certainly takes rank as one of the films of the week. It is a clearly audacious mixture of the real and unreal, although there are many, no doubt, who would accept the whole thing as absolutely natural throughout. The earlier scenes show Mr. Roosevelt and his party in Africa just as one may roughly imagine them to have been when they got to their animal-killing business. Unless we are mistaken there is a mixture of Indian and African costumes in the dressing of the natives, but the whole thing is full of movement and shows great resource on the part of the producers. The ex-President shoots a lion, and the dead king of the forest is carried away on poles by willing natives. It is all very cleverly done. The real interest of the film centers, however, in the photography—which was presumably done at Chicago—of a real lion. There is no doubt about this lion; he stalks majestically about the picture, thus enabling an audience to realize how a lion would look, not on the war path, but peaceably ambling about among natural surroundings. Your captive lion in a zoological park does not do much prowling about except in a small cage. This part of the film attracted very great attention; and we single the film out for special mention because we hope that it will be an encouragement to Mr. Selig and his merry men to cultivate the production of moving pictures of animal life, which are always attractive to moving picture audiences.

"THE SMUGGLER'S DAUGHTER" (Lubin).

Stories of the sea are always popular with moving picture audiences if they are well and naturally told. Who amongst us has not pored over an exciting narrative of smuggling life? In olden times the romance of maritime life drew half its inspiration from the deeds of dare and do which centered about the smuggler's cave. This is one of the best pictures which Mr. Lubin has produced. We emphasize the word picture. He places the scene of the story on a very rocky coast with the waves beating and lashing themselves into clouds of spray. The eyes are delighted with these very fine photographs of coast characteristics. The story is a simple one. The smuggler, who is helped in his work by his daughter, after landing his booty is nearly discovered by an inquisitive revenue officer. His daughter, however, prevents his arrest, and the revenue officer falls in love with her. After having sold his plunder, Mr. Smuggler returns to his work and is again shielded by his daughter. She shields her father only too well; the revenue officers are out after the delinquent. The girl assumes her father's hat and cloak and is shot in mistake for her father. She is lying wounded in her bed when the father discovers her plight, and so he very properly takes the blame upon his shoulders and gives himself up to the officers. The girl is left in the care of her revenue lover, and we are left to assume that she recovers and marries him. This is the outline of the story which is told against a very fine background of sea and rocks. The story is not unduly spun out, it is clear and intelligible, and it certainly pleased the audience before whom we saw it shown. On these grounds, therefore, we consider it entitled to mention as a notable film of the week. Photographically speaking the picture is, on the whole, excellent. Its tones and tints are strikingly good. We will risk being termed hypercritical, however, in pointing out that Mr. Lubin's assistants might have sent out this beautiful picture with fewer light and dark spots on it. Those are the technical drawbacks on the picture. But still it is a minor matter. The point we want to bring home to Mr. Lubin is this, that sea pictures of this quality are welcome as an occasional relief to the usual run of subjects. Smuggling is by no means dead around these coasts, and the devotion of a daughter to her father is a very pretty theme to handle.

THE RESURRECTION (Biograph).

Step by step the Biograph Company is making for itself a unique position among American film manufacturers. Within the last few months its reputation among exhibitors and the general public has increased by leaps and bounds. We doubt whether the exhibitors or the public could say off-hand exactly why they like Biograph pictures so much. It is sufficient for them that they like them and want more. The good photographic qualities of the pictures are now taken as a matter of course. But good photography alone will not make a successful moving picture film. There must be something more, and we think we know what that something more is.

It is the dramatic quality of the pictures that convincingly appeals to exhibitors and the public. The Biograph picture to-day tells a story and tells that story well. Moreover the Biograph film is one in which one is almost sure to see good acting. Unequivocally, therefore, we have no hesitation in saying that the Biograph picture of the moment is unexcelled for its dramatic and photographic qualities. In the former of these qualities it is very evident in "The Resurrection," a recent release. We were curious to see how the Fourteenth Street Company interpreted Tolstoi's melancholy story. The public opinion on the film when we saw it echoed our own interest. As the picture started to move, there was a sudden hush in the theatre, which always indicates concentrated interest. And that hush continued right to the end of the film, when the afflicted girl kneels at the foot of the cross on the Siberian steppes. In these same scenes, where the fallen girl is on her way to Siberia in company with other unfortunates, and is knouted by Russian soldiers, there is an aspect of unreality, excessively sharp modeling and not particularly convincing snow, which we suppose could not be avoided owing to the exiguity of space at Fourteenth street. But in the preceding scenes, in which the peasant girl and the prince are shown in their urban environment, the pleasant sin and its penitential punishment for the girl, and the unmolested freedom of her betrayer, the Biograph staging is quite as convincing as that of an ordinary play. And then the acting of the leading woman and the prince—how fine and tragic the former is! how excellent the latter! We do not know the lady's name, but certainly she seems to us to have a very fine command of her emotions and to be able to express these emotions before such an unemotional thing as a camera. A very ordinary person indeed can act before a crowded house of interested men and women, but it takes a genius to do so with real feeling on a moving picture stage. For there is no eager, sympathetic audience of thousands before you there, but only the staff of the company or the matter-of-fact person who turns the handle and exposes so many feet of sensitized celluloid per minute on the players.

"Resurrection," of course, is a moral lesson; so was "Faust" and so were many other great tragedies. We think it really wonderful that the Biograph Company should handle this theme with such fidelity and conscientiousness. The story is kept clearly in view through its closely-acted, well-costumed scenes, and it goes without saying, is well-photographed. The film should increase the popularity of Biograph subjects, as in all respects it is most noteworthy. As we have said before, the hushed attention which greeted it when we saw it is the best criterion of its many merits.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"Cigarette Making."—A Vitagraph educational picture, showing the process of cigarette making from picking the tobacco in the fields to the finished cigarette, with its fragrant curling smoke. In the main the photography is good, though naturally it is extremely difficult to make perfectly clear photographs of machines in motion. The lighting where they are located is not always the best, but in this film most of those technical objections have been overcome and the picture is really what it claims to be, a faithful representation of the processes of cigarette manufacture as practiced in the factories of the American Tobacco Company. Static electricity markings were very noticeable in this film.

"Old Sweethearts of Mine."—In this Vitagraph film the former subject is really continued. It is termed a phantasy in smoke, and as the gentleman muses by the fire, watching the smoke from his cigarette curl upward, the faces of his former sweethearts appear to him. The film is mainly attractive for the memories it awakens in the minds of all those of middle age, or older, also novel photographic effects.

"The Blind Man of Jerusalem."—Biblical subjects seem popular with all manufacturers just now, and Gaumont has produced an exceedingly dramatic picture under the above title. The most moving scenes, the two climaxes, first when Christ restores the sight of the blind man, and the second when the former blind man watches Christ pass, bearing his cross on the way to crucifixion, are so impressive they are not soon forgotten. One's attention is held irresistibly as the former blind man pleads with the Master to know why he gave him sight to see the wickedness of the world, as exemplified in the dishonesty of his servants, the unfaithfulness of his daughter and the cruelty of those who crucified the Master. Then a flood of light breaks over his soul, even as it broke through his darkened vision, and he forgives. No description can convey the dramatic power of this picture. It must be seen to be appreciated. It is toned brown, and in the main the technique is beyond criticism. It is a pity that it could run but one day. It ought to have a long run.

"Glories of Sunset."—Anyone who has ever attempted to catch the fleeting glories of a sunset should see this picture from the Gaumont studio. The success with which the coloring and the sinking rays of the sun are reproduced is remarkable. The coloring, the toning and the entire picture portray with remarkable fidelity the beauties of departing day and returning night. When it ended the audience showed their appreciation by applause.

"The Bondman's Fate."—A Pathe which is scenic rather than dramatic, the landscapes shown being especially fine. There is too much cold-blooded cruelty and an outright murder of a girl which make the picture depressing rather than entertaining, and the close seems to be without particular point.

"Cured by Gymnastics."—A Pathe which presents numerous funny incidents, but which inclines toward coarseness and is, therefore, rather undesirable than otherwise.

"Mr. Inquisitive."—A Lubin, which, like all the Lubin comedies, is funny and creates a good deal of sport before it closes.

"Officer McCue."—A Lubin which tells an interesting story in a species of dime novel manner. There are some climaxes, but they are not really dramatic. Technically the film is good, though some little things look queer. For instance, the policemen all have on long coats inside. They march out and have on short ones when they arrive outside. Inside only one has white stripes on his trousers. Outside they all have them on. Of course these do not mar the story, nor spoil the funny situations, but one wonders sometimes why it happens.

"Two Memories."—A drama from the Biograph studio which affords their star actress an excellent opportunity which she develops in a perfectly satisfactory manner. The influence of the film is depressing, yet one must acknowledge its power and admit that here indeed is true dramatic art. An actress, who can make events actually live before the audience, deserves the highest commendation. Technically the film has scarcely a flaw, hence the dramatic power can be enjoyed to the utmost.

"Eloping with Aunty."—One of the cleanest bits of comedy which has come from any studio in many a long day. The humor is worked out in a novel way, and while it has no particular dramatic feature, it is so cleverly funny that the audience laughs continuously. The technique could scarcely be improved, hence the picture deserves a long run.

"Jephthath's Daughter."—A Biblical subject which has been considered one of the dramatic events of ancient Jewish history, and which, in capable hands, lends itself very readily to thrilling reproduction. In the hands of the Vitagraph Company this subject has been admirably worked out, and the result is a satisfactory film. Like the one previously criticised, much of the staging, which includes the costuming, must be taken on trust, but it would seem that the work has been well done. The priestly garb, the soldiers and the others seem to be costumed in accordance with the accepted interpretation of modern scholars. In the acting, Ada, Jephthah's daughter, the central figure of this tragedy, does her work as well as is possible. Jephthah is admirably acted, these two figures rising to true tragedy in their interpretation of their parts. The others are merely accessories, and their work calls for no extended review. The film is toned brown, excepting the sacrificial altar just before the fire is lighted, which is a rather heavy blue, and after the fire is lighted it is a brilliant red, like the glow of a fire. Both changes heighten the effect and improve the picture. As a whole this effort is to be warmly commended. It is a film well worth seeing, and indicates the earnestness with which the Vitagraph people approach their work.

"Justice or Mercy."—A Gaumont which exerts a depressing influence, even though mercy, not justice, prevails and the beggar is permitted to go with his unfortunate daughter. By far the best bit of acting is that of the sister, who looks at the beggar and finally tells the officers he did not take the pocketbook. This exemplification of mercy justifies the film's existence, and perhaps, one might say, makes it worth while.

"A Guest's Predicament."—A Gaumont comedy which is well acted and has several highly amusing situations, which are admirably worked out with close attention to details and a reasonably even technique.

"Cartouche."—A Pathe film d'art which is admirably staged and acted. It is, in a degree, an exaggeration, since it would be scarcely possible for any individual outside a novel to perform the deeds credited to Cartouche. As king of thieves he is an admirable character, and he does his work so easily and naturally that he doesn't seem to be acting at all, and his attitude when he is led away to torture is so compelling that one is almost constrained to admire him for his very indifference to his fate. The film is beautifully colored. While the subject is not entirely pleasant it must be confessed that it is thrilling and forces one to overlook the depressing features in the determination and affrontery of Cartouche.

"Vaccination Against Injuries."—A Lux which reproduces the same character picture as some of the other magic sorts which have gone before. It has a good deal of rough humor, yet it develops a good many amusing situations and rouses liberal laughs as absurd after absurd situation passes. As a break in a heavy programme it might do, but it is scarcely pointed enough to form any special attraction in itself.

"The Farmer's Grandson."—A Great Northern film which tells plainly and clearly a story of cruelty and abandonment, coupled with honesty and bravery, which finally conquer an old man's opposition, resulting in a happy ending to serious trouble. The little boy, the principal character, is satisfactory and convincing. It would be difficult to do his work better. The grandfather is also good, and as the others are merely assistants their individualities scarcely exert much influence upon one. In the main the photography is good, but there are places where it might be improved. As a whole it is a satisfactory film. A touch of tragedy is given in forcing the little boy to shoot his own father to protect his grandfather, who, as yet, looks upon him as a stranger. It is, perhaps, this touch which transforms the whole into an admirable film. Otherwise its dramatic qualities are scarcely more than commonplace.

"In Sardinia."—An Itala picture which has two climaxes of dramatic interest which are well handled, but is otherwise rather commonplace. Nor is the photography even, varying from soft carefully lighted effects to harsh lighting and absolute dimness in some places. The appearance of a ghost just as the father is separating the young couple is well managed and the acting at this juncture is excellent. It must be said candidly, however, that the film does not please.

"A Somnambulistic Hero."—An Edison picture which introduces a somnambulist doing a heroic piece of work which won for him the hearty congratulations of his friends. The interest is chiefly in the novelty of the scheme. To make a hero of a sleep walker is sufficiently attractive to arouse interest, and in this particular instance the picture is applauded. Dramatically it lacks situations which can be called chances, with the exception of where the sleep walker unconsciously gathers in the criminals the posse is chasing. Photographically the picture is fairly good. Some parts of it are marred by harsh lighting, while other parts are lighted evenly and softly. As a whole the picture pleases because it tells a novel story in a reasonably satisfactory way.

"The Indian Trailer."—An Essanay picture in which this firm's capable company has produced another of its Western stories. The staging of these Western stories is always good and this is no exception. The story is what its title indicates, and represents the ability of an Indian to trail a kidnapper. In photography this picture is a great advance upon some turned out by the Essanay people and emphasizes, by comparison, what they are capable of doing.

"Caught On the Cliffs."—An Eclipse film which is more scenic than dramatic, though a thrilling touch is given when the baby falls over the cliffs, and another when the child is restored to his parents and his foster father turns to leave him. The principal interest is excited by the excellent reproduction of mountain scenery, which includes rocks and cliffs that actually look like what they represent. In the main the photography is good, only here and there touches of dimness are noted. It is interesting but does not hold by its dramatic power.

"Objections Overruled."—An Eclipse which has some dramatic elements which cannot be said to have been developed as emphatically as they might have been. Where the turned away musician lover tells the soldiers of his predicament is one point that has interest, and where the little boy engages in a duel with the leader is another, but otherwise the acting is only commonplace. In places this film is of poor quality, while in others it is good. The Eclipse pictures are generally so good it seems a pity that they should fail in any degree. The staging is quite in keeping with the subject, and while the humor is of the broad, suggestive kind it cannot be called unpleasant.

"Pere Milon."—In this reproduction of an episode of the Franco-Prussian War the Pathes have emphasized the brutality of the soldier at the expense of the Germans. This is a drama which has few elements to make it attractive, even though the Pathe actors are admittedly as good as can be obtained for motion pictures. The supreme dramatic moment is where Pere Milon is recognized and shot because he has worked such havoc in the ranks of the Prussians, sixteen deaths standing to his credit. This may be an interesting subject for the French, on the same principle as a dime novel is interesting, but a film in which nineteen deaths are either shown or suggested is much too bloody to be tolerated in America. Good staging, good acting and a smooth running film cannot atone for these defects. It should be suppressed.

"Blessings Sometimes Come in Disguise."—A semi-humorous film from Pathe which mechanically is quite up to the Pathe standard. Possibly a young woman finding a husband through the loss of a dog makes a story worth all the elaborate work put into this, but it seems like a waste of effort. It means nothing when it is done, and one follows the development of the story with a listless interest only.

THE KIMBLE ELECTRIC CO. HAS SOLVED THE PROBLEM FOR VENTILATING MOTION PICTURE THEATERS.

The point is being agitated that theaters should be ventilated, but the question arises how to do away with the everlasting humming of the fan? The Kimble people come to the rescue with a fan that is absolutely noiseless. Their fan has speeds from 80 to 700 revolutions per minute, controlled by two hanging chains, any gradation of speed, between the maximum and the minimum, can be had. See their announcement on page 407.

This fan is usually run at high speed during intermission and reduced to a lower speed during the performance, thus keeping a constant circulation of pure air. The cost of running this fan is greatly reduced because the current consumption is in direct ratio with the speed and power. It is very simply constructed and shipped in one piece, all ready to be installed. A child could run it, as it is stopped, started and regulated by the two chains. These chains can be put in the operator's booth or at any place desired.

Jenkins or Lumiere make preferred. Must be cheap and in first-class condition. Address, C. G. R., care of Moving Picture World.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Ever kissed or been kissed, reader? Of course you have. You remember the first you gave her or she gave you, don't you? Of course you do. The art of osculation is inherent in all created beings. Some savages, I believe, kiss by rubbing noses. Animals kiss. Ever see two dogs at the game, or cats? There is a great deal of human nature in man, still more in woman, and considerably more of it in animals.

Now what has all this to do with moving pictures? you ask. Wait and I will tell you. The other evening I sat out an entertainment in a New York house. The pictures were exceedingly good and everybody round about me seemed to share my enjoyment of them. What do you think was the item of the entertainment which pleased me so much? Guess. Guess again. And guess again. Now, as I don't think you will guess at all, I will tell you. It was just a kiss. Not a kiss in the audience; not a kiss from the fair but strange charmer who sat on my left and occasionally made eyes at me, but a kiss from—where do you think, of all places in the world? From the orchestra. In other words, it was one of the sound effects of the evening.

I don't clearly remember the film that was being shown at the time, but I remember that kiss. I wake up in the nights and think of it. I would like to have one like it from my best girl. Or somebody else's best girl. I am not particular. In fact, my affection for the ladies is only equalled by that of the gentleman to whom I referred last week—Solomon. As I told you, he solved the affinity problem by always having a few hundreds of them on hand. Wonder how he kept them all in order, and what kind of hats they wore, and if they were suffragettes, and if they wore rats? Wonder lots of other things which I won't specify.

To come back to that kiss, there was a particular part of the picture where the man and the woman had to kiss. Click! came the little sound from the orchestra. It is not a click, and it is not a smack. I don't know how to describe it. Nor do you, dear reader. Nor does anybody else who tries to describe that kiss. It cannot be described. It must be experienced, it must be tasted, it must be heard, and it must be felt. A nice thing it is to get one of the right sort. I know. I had one the other evening from—well, never mind who.

That little kiss made the success of the picture, it was so spontaneous and so natural. Dear, good, kind Yerkes & Co., how do you make it? You are magicians after my own heart. I love you, I bless you, and I hope that the concourse of sweet sounds which it is the business of your excellent lives to disseminate will grow, multiply and never diminish. It all comes to this, that in the opinion of your Lux Graphicus the sound effects of a moving picture not merely materially enhance the general effect of it, but when skillfully introduced are so welcome and pleasing to an audience that the time is surely at hand when no moving picture will be considered without them. It has been pointed out how much Lyman Howe relies for his success upon his sound effects. There is great scope for them. They add to the humor of a situation; they accentuate it, in fact; they punctuate the monotony, if I may so term it, of a picture so agreeably that when once an audience has learned to appreciate the value of sound effects they will never be content without them. So you see, brethren and sistern, what I mean by asking you if you have ever kissed or been kissed. A kiss is a great thing. If it had not been for the one I heard the other night, I should not have written this column; Yerkes & Co. would not have got this nice reference, and the whole course of the moving picture's future progress might have been changed. Great events spring from little causes, and you may take it from me that my reference to that maddening, that enthralling, that fascinating kiss, will draw increased attention to the importance of sound effects to moving picture exhibitions.

Kurtz & Mack is the name of a new firm located at the Royal Theatre building, Sandusky, They are makers of moving picture effects and announcement slides. These two youngsters are without a doubt the only two boy slide-and-effect makers in the United States to-day at the age of sixteen. Their work has all been satisfactory wherever used in Ohio. They are getting out on an average, after school hours and on Saturdays, two hundred advertising slides a week.

THE PATHE STANDARD.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir:—Your edition of May 15th reached me this a. m. and, as usual, I thoroughly read it. I would like to contest a little point with you. You say that "American manufacturers are constantly threatening that their films will shortly reach the Pathé standard of quality, but haven't reached there yet." I found this under "Notable Films of the Week." I admit that "The Hunter's Grief" was by all odds the finest film of the week, but I also think that one company has attained the Pathé standard. I mean the Biograph Company. I'm thinking of the weekly output of the two companies when I make this claim, not comparing each particular film with each other. I ask for your opinion on the subject because I consider yours to be the very best and most conclusive journal that is dealing with motion pictures. If you will favor me with a reply, I will esteem it a favor.

ARTHUR H. ROSENBAUM,
Star Theatre, Boston, Mass.

[The American manufacturers to whom we referred are recent entrants into the moving picture field. We should have been more precise in our references and have said "some" manufacturers. Our opinion of the Biograph Company's productions appears this week in "Notable Films of the Week."

Ed. M. P. W.]

AN INVITATION.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Enclosed please find our check for two ($2.00) dollars to cover renewal cost of one year's subscription for Moving Picture World from May 1, 1909. Enclosed also please find two passes, which will explain their object and the location of our houses.

We would be delighted to meet your own critic at our especially built theaters, the "Imperial," in the Bronx, and our "Grand," in Brooklyn, and escort him (or her) down our carpeted aisles to a comfortable upholstered opera seat and see all the pictures the same week they are released, accompanied by a talented orchestra of ladies at our "Grand" and a male orchestra at the "Imperial."

Would be pleased to explain our system of ventilating the auditorium and our spacious machine room. From your weekly comments on the shows we see you have not as yet discovered these two palaces. We hope you will introduce yourself to us whenever you chance to be in these localities.

Why, we have some of the houses you have so far commented upon beat to a "frazzle," as the Moving Picture World has the other papers of the trade.

Trusting to have the honor of a visit from either yourself or representative in the near future,

Sincerely yours,
McKENZIE & LANE.

1870 Bathgate avenue,
New York, May 24, 1909.

["Our own crtic" selects his own shows for comment. In respect of the foregoing invitation, he has chosen the house with the "talented orchestra of ladies" for an early visit.—Editor M. P. W.]

INDEPENDENTS AND THE CENSORSHIP.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—While the licensed manufacturers show a real disposition to abide by the Board of Censorship, in eliminating suggestive or too highly sensational films, the Independents seem to rely on sensational productions to build a name and a market for themselves.

It is true that at one time all the manufacturers got the wrong impression that the public was demanding and was craving for sensational films. That this was wrong the work of the censors fully illustrates. Such demands have not been made by the public but by uncultured and unscrupulous exhibitors who, unable to judge themselves of the taste of the public followed their own low morals, believing that anything questionable was the right thing to draw an audience.

The Independents (American manufacturers) of to-day seem to follow the same course. They want to enter the market on a jump and to create a quick demand for their productions, believing that they have only to cater to the low element.

To fairly judge of this question I closely watched the audiences at some recent visits to Keith's Theater, on Fourteenth street. It is needless to state that such a theater is always well patronized, consequently it is a good place at which to form an opinion of the wishes of the public. On Saturday and Monday, May 15 and 17, I saw 12 new releases and 4 old films, all from different licensed manufacturers. These films showed that the manufacturers have enough good subjects illustrating the better sides of life, without having to ransack the slums for scenes depicting the ugly sides of humanity.

"The Jilt," "The Actor's Mother," "A False Accusation," "A Woman's Heart," "The Beggar's Coin," were five highly dramatic, well treated subjects, which kept the audience in suspense from beginning to end. In these films we have some very sad scenes depicting some of our weaknesses, going direct to the heart of the spectators; but at the same time we have some remarkable scenes, showing that even in our wickedness we have room for good sentiments. These five films are free from any bad or immoral desires.

I wish we could say the same of the Independents. Such is not the case. Of three new films released by Independent American manufacturers, one shows the very unnatural conduct of a son. If such a man in the United States should treat his father in such a manner he would be quickly lynched. In the two other films, both of them have a similar scene—of a woman locked in a room at the mercy of a villain. One of the manufacturers, after giving a very vivid description of the struggles between a married woman and an intruder, adds in the circular: "We are forced to admit that the above is but a meagre description of this powerful picture."

I am sorry to see the Independents adopt such a poor policy, and if they persevere in this direction they will soon find that they can not make a success with such highly sensational films. The Independent manufacturers should bear in mind that if in large cities they can find a few places where they can exhibit some suggestive films, they will find great opposition in the country places.

Many suggestive scenes are sometimes necessary to fully and clearly illustrate a picture, but in such cases the respectable manufacturers do not dwell heavily on them. In "The Actor's Mother" the manufacturer shows us that the son, captivated by the members of his stage profession, forgets his mother, but the manufacturer does not show us any sensational or suggestive scenes. The presence of the actresses is to give an excuse for the neglect of the son, a mere neglect, as the last scene proves us that he still loves his old mother.

To resume my experience at Keith's Theater, we had two films which greatly pleased the audiences, "Animal Sagacity," "The Doings of a Poodle." Both are old films, but they were received with as much pleasure as if they had been new releases, as both depict the intelligence of animals and show us that often these dumb friends have better qualities than ourselves, at least more good will. The wonderful work of the dog, who after failing to arouse the house for help, goes to the stable and gets the help of the saddle horse to rescue his young mistress, thrills the heart of the spectator more than any of these suggestive scenes and does more good. The clever work of the poodle, snatching his master's pocketbook from the hands of the thief, caused much genuine hilarity.

We had two historic films which made a good diversion and encouraged the patriotic feelings of many of our young citizens. They were: "The Press Gang," "A Little Hero."

The balance of the programmes of the two days was made of seven comic films, some of them very clever and void of long chases and foolish tumbles. Yours, etc.,

J. M. BRADLET.

[We trust some of the newer entrants into the manufacturing field will take note of Mr. Bradlet's reasonable criticisms. Pictures of the "Deadwood Dick" and "hold up" variety are as antiquated as the legends of Mayne Reid and Fennimore Cooper.—Editor M. P. W.]

THE HISTORY OF SONG SLIDES.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In a recent issue Mr. D. C. Wheeler states that illustrated songs were first used by Myer Cohen some twenty years ago in San Francisco; while your correspondent, "Lux Graphicus," states he saw them in London thirty years ago. They are both many years short of the origination of illustrated songs. In the year 1873 I suggested to Mr. Tony Pastor the idea of having tableuax or paintings of song subjects and he after some thought evolved the idea of illustration by stereopticon, and commissioned me to purchase the machine, which I did of Peck & Co., 514 Broadway, New York City, with gas bag for making the gas, the old-fashioned way. John F. Poole wrote the song and I purchased from

Peck a number of portraits of historical Americans and such scenes as Washington taking leave of his army; the signing of the Declaration of Independence; Abraham Lincoln and his cabinet, etc.

Frank Girard worked the pictures and Billy Barry, the comedian, sat on the gas bag, in the absence of sufficient weight, on the first night.

Mr. Pastor took the song on the road on his annual tour and there must be many living to-day who can testify to this. The original pictures, I believe, are still in the possession of Mrs. Pastor. Truly yours,

H. S. SANDERSON,
Manager for Tony Pastor,
1872-1908.

May 20, 1909.

[We are not sure, but believe that in the early "sixties" of last century the illustrated song slide formed a feature of the entertainment at The Panopticon, Leicester square, London, a place of entertainment with which the name of the late F. H. Wenham was identified. Wenham was an all-round genius who anticipated many modern ideas. Either he, or the late Professor Coleman Sellers, of Philadelphia, another master mind, claimed to have preceded several soi-disant inventors of the moving picture camera. The latter is by no means the novelty many persons appear to think it is.—Editor M. P. W.]

NICHOLAS POWER CO.,
115 Nassau St., New York.

Dear Sirs:—

We hereby give you the facts regarding the two Power's Inductors placed in service at our Imperial Theatre at Third Avenue, near Tremont avenue.

As you know, we have had five $100.00 economizers in service for some time at our other houses. Comparing the Power's Inductor with these, after a thorough trial, we have this to say:

The current saving is satisfactory.

The light is more steady and one does not have to feed carbons so often, this saving in carbons is about 35% we find.

The adjustment switch is a valued improvement over our other saving devices.

Perhaps the best recommendation we can forward at the present is our order for two more Power's Inductors to be delivered to our new house at 47th St. and Third Ave., Brooklyn, which we expect to open by May 1st, 1909.

Yours truly,
(Signed) MCKENZIE & LANE.

Gladstone, Mich.—W. H. Needham and Clarence McLauren have purchased the moving picture theater of Habermann Brothers and taken possession.

Dickenson, N. D.—R. F. Warren has disposed of his interests in the Unique Vaudeville and Moving Picture Theater to Walter Junkin, who has taken possession.

Sheboygan, Wis.—E. J. Sthay has purchased the Lyric Moving Picture Theater, located in the Trester Building on North Eighth street, and will make extensive improvements.

Pana, Ill.—The Delmar Theater has discontinued vaudeville and will in future show only moving pictures.

The White Palace still produces a good program of moving pictures each night. It has proven that a moving picture theater properly conducted is what pays in Pana.

Indianapolis, Ind.—The Orpheum, the newly appointed theater on Washington street, is meeting with great success. The finely arranged interior, excellent pictures and courteous attendants, is the key to its success.

Evansville, Ind.—William Burns, manager of the West Side Amusement Co., is busily engaged preparing for the grand opening of the Colonial Theater, in the West Side, which when completed will be one of the handsomest vaudeville and moving picture houses in southern Indiana. He will use nothing but Independent films, as he objects to paying the $2 weekly license which is demanded for the use of Trust films.

Newport, Ky.—The "Nimo" Theater (an abbreviation of Ninth and Monmouth streets) is one of the neatest and most popular moving picture houses in this town. It opened on February 21 and made such a hit with the Passion Play on Good Friday that it was repeated by request last week. Miss Valentine Tresser is pianist, Mr. Burbank works the trap drums and effects, and Mr. M. Meyer, formerly with Lubin's Cincinnati house, puts on the picture. Messrs. Hennegan & Stopper, the proprietors, are justly proud of their place and the popularity it has attained.

THE ILLUMINATION OF THE THEATER.

J. Berthiaume & Co., who are proprietors of a high-class picture show in Spencer, Mass., and are about to build another place, are much interested in the paragraph on page 631 of our issue of the 15th inst. in reference to lighting the show while the picture is on the screen. This matter was touched upon again on page 674 of last week's issue, where our reporter visited a theater when a demonstration was being given of the aluminum-coated screen patented by A. L. Simpson, of slide fame. The object of this screen is to increase the reflecting quality, so that the amber-tinted electric light bulbs which are kept burning around the room do not interfere with the brightness of the picture on the screen. We can point to another theater where the ordinary untinted lights are kept burning during the performance and where the light underneath is so good that we can read with ease the small type in the stories of the films in the pages of the Moving Picture World, while the picture on the screen is brighter and better than in some theaters that are almost in darkness. This comfortable and desirable illumination is obtained by a system that was first suggested in the Moving Picture World some time ago. The lights are arranged on the ceiling, especially over the aisles, but they are shielded so that the incandescent bulbs are not visible from any part of the screen nor in the line of vision of anyone looking at the screen. The light shines down direct on the heads of the audience and in the aisles, and as the seats are a dark red and the aisles are carpeted in red, there is no reflected light to dull the picture on the screen. The class of people who frequent this theater shows that the prevailing brightness is appreciated. In some other places we have seen the lights arranged so that they are shaded from the curtain, but as they are not shielded from the eyes of the people sitting behind, the effect is irritating and tiresome to the eyes. As we have said before, it would be a simple matter to arrange inverted V-shaped shades of tin which would reflect the light downwards, the outside of the shades to be painted green or some dark color. In this way there is hardly any limit to the amount of light that may be allowed in comfort and safety.

The Newark "Star," in commenting upon the rapid increase and popularity of the picture show, says that "it is only in the first stage of development and is destined to do a large educational work." To attain that end and to ensure its continued success, the manufacturers of films should avoid any criminal or immoral suggestion, or, in fact, anything that would not be tolerated in word or print in the pages of the best conducted magazines that are to be found on the family table.

OPERATORS.

By F. H. Richardson.

In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, May 15th issue, appears an article under the caption "Poor Operators," the text of which follows the old "There's the current, the machine and a film; put the film on the machine, close the switch, turn the crank and you have a show" idea.

Of course any one could do these few simple things, and, were it not for the fire danger, a ten-year-old boy could operate as well as any one. Lord, yes! The article in question is all right so far as it goes, but it has the wrong heading. It is a roast on operators who speed up, but the writer thereof fails to realize that this is the one fault for which the operator oftentimes should not be blamed, except in so far as one blames him for obeying the order of a manager or owner who is excited because the house is full and would rather ruin the show than lose a few nickels, though he will lose them anyhow, usually as a result of his action, but the loss will come later on; he will get the nickels that night, and that is as far as too many owners and managers are able to see.

The poor operator gets blamed for many things, and is to blame for many, but, if that is true, how much more is it true that the owners and managers are at the root of the evil? This "turn-the-crank" operator idea has done more to injure the motion picture business than the average exhibitor realizes or would care to admit if he did. The operator is the man who puts on the show, and you might as well say that a cheap barnstormer can play Hamlet as well as the best talent as to assert that the cheap, careless, ignorant operator can put on a creditable show.

Speed is quite an important item, and in some films requires very close attention on the part of the operator, but it by no manner of means follows that, as the writer of the article says, the machine should always be run at the same speed as was the camera which made the pictures. Very frequently the careful, intelligent operator is able to bring a roar of laughter or burst of applause from the audience by speeding up on some scene which would fall utterly flat if run at camera speed. Very often, too, camera speed may be greatly reduced in the machine, especially with heavy dramatic or religious subjects, with excellent effect. But in how many houses is there an operator capable of discriminating nicely in such matters? and in those houses where real operators are employed how many of them have any encouragement in doing really fine work? I pause for reply.

But, after all, speed is only one small item in the sum of knowledge required to make a really first-class operator. He must thoroughly understand carbons, have a good working knowledge of electricity, thorough knowledge of the action of the electric arc, a working knowledge of optics, understand several electric wiring systems, and be a good mechanic, since parts of the machine require very close adjustment. In addition to all this, he must have some of the attributes of the salamander and be willing to do artistic work in a little 2 x 4 iron-lined coop stuck up in any corner that an intelligent owner or manager decided was no earthly use for anything else. One prime requisite is that he shall be content with and exceedingly grateful for a salary equal to about half the wage of a hod carrier—in fact this is the first consideration with the average manager or owner, the little matter of ability being taken up only after the wage question has been settled. If the wage is low enough some managers are so well pleased that they forget the other trifling item (ability) altogether. "He can surely turn a crank," the intelligent—may I be forgiven for the lie in that word?—muses, and the ex-section man is hired. He is conducted in triumph to the "operating room" (God save the mark!), where he finds a bottle of six-months-old cement, a pair of broken shears, a ten-cent cast-iron gas plier and a ditto screw-driver. That's the "kit." (Of course he has no tools of his own; he wouldn't know how to use them, so why own any?) He also discovers a machine in more or less bad condition, a lamp he will need a crowbar to move, connected with a cable a size or two too small, its ends badly burned and several unsoldered joints in it. His resistance will consist of a rheostat just as small as will handle the current when it is all "in" and red hot. He will also find a five or ten-cent bottle of cheap oil kicking around somewhere if he looks closely. Our "operator" closes the switch and touches the lamp house and it promptly knocks him down for the familiarity. The whole thing is charged, of course. He gets the film on, starts his "light" and puts on the "show." (Te, he, he, he!) Our intelligent manager is tickled plumb to death. It's rotten, of course, but it is C—H—E—A—P, and nothing else counts.

The foregoing is a word picture of an extreme case—and no worse than the writer has seen time and again with his own eyes—but the conditions named obtain to a greater or less degree in an amazingly large number of motion picture theatres. The whole truth of the matter is, the average manager or owner doesn't know enough about the business to know poor work when he sees it. He blunders into a theatre where they have a real operator, and give him a chance to do his work right. He sees the difference, but attributes it, nine times in ten, to everything but the right cause.

Stop roasting the operator for a while, and hand a few bunches to those who deserve it, just for a change. There is not one motion picture theatre out of a hundred, the country over, in which the best possible work is being done. That is a bald-headed fact. Operator salaries are too low to induce many really capable men to take up the work. Operating room conditions are in thousands of cases simply wretched. Managers as a general rule are so slow to recognize excellence by way of the pay envelope that even the men who are doing good work become discouraged and degenerate into sloppiness. If the manager would look first to ability and then to the pay end, and if, when they found they had a good man who was careful, painstaking and delivered the goods, they would say, "Here, old man, I'm going to spring your salary a couple of dollars," or even a dollar a week, and do it voluntarily, they might find the service would be of the best all the time, provided always that the outfit and operating room be such that good work could be done.

RELEASED MAY 25, 1909

No. 6463 Brothers In Arms Code, VENULUS Approximate Length, 975 feet

A Military drama. A film of extraordinary interest, with a virile, soul gripping story, tense in action, startling in situations and climaxes, all interwoven with a military display of majestic magnitude. A peerless presentation, powerful and picturesque. Throbbing with heart interest, brilliantly acted and magnificently mounted with artillery roaring and cavalry dashing in actual action. A film that will increase your receipts by pleasing your patrons and attracting new ones. Have it included in your film service.

RELEASED MAY 28, 1909

No. 6464 A Child's Prayer Code, VENUNDEBAT Approximate Length, 660 feet

A touching story of how, upon seeing a child kneeling in prayer, a jealous fisherman was induced to rescue her father whom he had assulted and put to sea in an open boat. A subject always in favor among the patrons of motion picture exhibitions.

RELEASED MAY 28, 1909

No. 6461 Professor Fix Fixed Code, VENULEIUS Approximate Length, 340 feet

Professor Fix, among other things, is a ventriloqual performer at county fairs. He came to grief, however, when some boys stole his dummies and he substituted live men for the latter. The live subjects forgot their lines and began to talk together when the Professor's back was turned. The audience then caused things to happen.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

WHAT DRINK DID.—A powerful moral lesson in Biograph pictures. "Oh, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains! that we should, with joy, revel and applause transform ourselves into beasts!" That there is a wealth of truth in the above lines of the immortal bard Shakespeare is undeniable, for drink is the genesis of most of the world's woe. And yet, despite the warnings, we plunge headlong into the bottomless seething pit of intemperance. With joy? Yes, for the drunkard is esteemed a "jolly good fellow." With revel? Yes, for the portal to this hall of disaster is gilded, bright and fascinating. With applause? Yes, for the inebriate is lauded for his capacity. So you see Satan's machinations in the inoculation of his victim with the most diresome disease are extremely subtle. Alfred Lucas, an industrious wood carver, is a dutiful husband and loving father. The happy little family of father, mother and two girl children—one six and the other eight—are seen enjoying their morning meal prior to his departure for work. A fond adieu, and Lucas is on his way. Assiduously working at his bench he strongly contrasts the drones, whose faces are noticeably seared with the lines of dissipation. At noontime luncheon is served, and kettles of beer are brought in by some. Lucas becomes a butt of ridicule on account of his refusal to imbibe, and after a deal of persuasion is prevailed upon to take just one drink. This was his undoing, for he likes the taste, and when work is over it takes but mild encouraging to make him yield to the invitation to go to the saloon. Several drinks make him forgetful of the family, anxiously waiting for him at home, into whose presence he finally reels in an awful state of intoxication. Oh, what an awful sight the scene presents. The amazed and almost heartbroken wife, with her frightened children. Well, the seed is planted, and the noxious weed, nurtured by drink, thrives. The blight of rum changes the stamp of nature, turning the heretofore good-tempered man into a veritable demon. Night after night he comes home more the beast than human, until one evening he is later than usual and the older of the two girls goes in search of him. From tavern to tavern she goes until at last she finds him, but her pleading is in vain, and she is driven out by the drunken father. However, she returns and makes her last plea, for the father crazed by drink hurls her aside, and the poor little child falls against the bar. This arouses the sympathy of the waiter, who reproaches the father for his brutal assault. The father resents his interference with a blow, and the waiter retaliates with a pistol, firing it just as the little one arises and runs to her father, receiving the bullet in the head and dropping lifeless to the floor. For an instant the father doesn't seem to realize the horrible enormity of the affair, but soon the awful truth is clear to him and he becomes a raving maniac. What a lesson is here depicted. Shortly after we find him back at his work, a changed man. He is cured of the awful disease, but the scar is still perceptible. He has resolved to live his life for the welfare and peace of his faithful wife and remaining child. Length, 913 feet.

ERADICATING AUNTY.—E-rad'i-cate—to root out; remove; exterminate; abolish.—Webster's Dictionary. Well, that is practically what it means as the title of this Biograph comedy. Tom Norton married Flora, the niece and young ward of Miss Matilda Scroggins, and in a moment of indiscreet good humor writes Aunty to visit them at their villa. Of course Aunty comes, and is accompanied by the Rev. Joshua Whittington, the gentleman who has done the deed for the young couple. No sooner have they set foot on the place than the trouble begins. First of all, Aunty and the reverend gentleman object strenuously to the candied affection indulged in by the young couple. Then they proceed to run things to their own ideas. The cook does not furnish the table to suit them, so there is trouble in the kitchen; the servants are not alert enough, so they fall in for a share of the interlopers' despotism; and soon the household is in a tumult verging upon insurrection. At last a shaft of light breaks in upon the dark and stormy aspect in the person of Bill Corker, an old college chum of Tom's, who is the comedian of a show playing in the town, and he calls. Hearing the tale of woe of his friends, he volunteers to help them out. Well, talk about a "monkey and parrot" time; Bill plays the leading role in the funniest comedy he has ever done in the whole course of his histrionic career. Many things are pulled, but the climax comes when Bill, in a fire-eating cowboy makeup, chases the odious visitors out of the house, down the road to the railroad station, where they both leap on a moving train which carries them cityward, presumably thanking a benevolent Providence that they have escaped with their lives, no doubt to ejaculate whenever Norton Villa is mentioned, "Never again." So, though Bill was not a friend in need, he was a friend indeed. Length, 545 feet.

HIS DUTY.—Duty is above all consequences, and often, at a crisis of difficulty, commands us to throw them overboard. It commands us to look neither to the right nor to the left, but straight forward. These were the noble principles instilled in the makeup of Jack Allen, the policeman. Jack, his younger brother Bob and their mother comprised the little family. To-day is Bob's twenty-first birthday and mother and Jack make him a present of a cap, with his initials "B. A." on the lining. Jack goes out on his beat and Bob leaves the house seemingly highly pleased with his present. During the evening Jack is called to the scene of the robbery of a jewelry store. While going over the place for a possible clue, he finds a cap, on the inside of which there are the telltale letters "B. A.". Crushed beyond measure he seeks Bob out at their home and it is all too true. Bob is inclined to brave the situation, and the poor old mother's heart is breaking, but Jack's duty is plain. Bob is carried to prison. Length, 429 feet.

THE CURFEW BELL.—Cromwell's time was a period of blood and iron, yet the gold thread of romance may be found in some of even the sterner scenes of the dramatic epoch. Such a one is the story of the loyalist gentleman, his sweetheart, a gentle lady, and the curfew bell.

The lady's father did not look with favor on the gentleman's suit and to meet they must have appointment at a public inn. Here an accident contributed to have the lady's fair name brought into question by a roundhead officer and the gentleman defended it so well that he had to flee for his life.

His hiding place in a mighty ruin was discovered by Cromwell's men under circumstances which, false though they were, caused the gentleman to believe his sweetheart had betrayed him and this was indeed a greater blow than the short shrift at the hands of a summary court martial, which condemned him to death when curfew rang that night.

Torn with agony and despair the gentle lady sought mercy for her lover, little should his attack on the officer merit death, coming as it did in just resentment of an insult to her name, but her prayers fell on deaf ears. Vainly she besought the sexton who rang the fatal curfew to forego his duty that night, but he was obdurate. Despair gave an idea to her mind, the idea to alone prevent that bell from sending forth its signal of death, and alone she did. In the high belfry she threw herself to the clapper and as the great bell swayed back and forth she clung and stayed its tongue.

Bruised and torn she staggered down to find Cromwell returned and from him, touched by her wounds, received her lover's life and the right to leave the country for an asylum in France with him. The gentleman, it is almost needless to say, was not long in learning that his belief in his sweetheart's betrayal of him was founded on premises of falsity.

It is one of the most beautiful stories in English history and has been notably portrayed in this splendid film. Approximate length, 960 feet.

THE HOLDUP HELD UP.—The Lares and Penates of any crook are not happy or trustworthy gods at their best, but those that presided over the destinies of Buck Malley and Spider Burke the day they sought to hold up the careless and wealthy Mr. Shaugnessy must have had a particular grouch on or been assailed by soporific enemies of especial strength. Certain it is, however, that no crooks ever found themselves tangled up in a more unhappy situation than did they in this holdup.

Buck started the ball rolling. He say Shaugnessy with a bundle of money headed for a long walk and followed him with intent to get that money when a suitable location for his assault was reached. He cross countried on Shaugnessy and took refuge behind a tree. Almost at the same moment the Spider spied the promising pedestrian and slipped behind another tree nearer the approaching victim. It was a laugh for Buck when he saw this. He waited till Spider had relieved Mr. Shaugnessy of his wealth and then turned his artillery on the astounded crook. In vain the latter pleaded that they divide the spoils. Buck forced him to yield his gun and the Shaugnessy valuables, but so intent were they on their own affairs they forgot about the victim of the holdup. He saw what was transpiring, turned, slipped behind a line of bushes, from which he emerged to hit Buck over the head, seize the revolver and turn the tables on both crooks.

Shaugnessy had an entertaining story to tell that night to a crowd of listeners at his favorite club, but Buck and Spider had anything but pleasant thoughts or words of commendation for their defending gods as they tossed on hard cots in their cells and the manner in which Spider expressed his regard for Buck would have been worthy addition to any sea captain's working vocabulary. Approximate length, 160 feet.

A WIFE'S ORDEAL.—Over the happy home of a simple stone cutter a cloud steals when an artist sees in the wife a model for a painting he has conceived. Her husband forbids her to pose, but tempted by the fact that she can earn extra money in this manner to purchase dainty clothes for her child she consents, thinking she can hide it from her husband.

On the day she goes to the field with the artist, however, her husband sustains an injury in the quarry and returns home only to find the place deserted and the artist's handkerchief in the yard.

Mad with rage he seizes a weapon and, guided by a boy, follows his wife to the field where he murderously attacks the artist and is only prevented from killing him by an onrush of people.

Blinded for life the artist determines to prosecute to the limit and the stone cutter faces the possibility of a life sentence. He can be saved in but one way, for the wife to confess the husband had reason in her conduct for his attack and thus secure sympathy for him from the jury. Swayed by anxiety to serve her husband she yield's to the lawyer's arguments and blackens her own character on the witness stand.

Her husband refuses to believe anything but that she has told the truth as a witness and goes to prison for a short sentence filled with desire for revenge. He is tormented in his prison cell with visions of his wife living with the artist and on the expiration of his sentence seeks her out to kill her. He finds her, however, earning a living as a washwoman in poverty. A letter from her lawyers certifying to her innocence adds to the proof and he clasps her in his arms. Approximate length, 940 feet.

A POOR WIFE'S DEVOTION.—In this film is told the unhappy story of a poor faithful wife. The daughter of Monocterian parents; that peculiar race of mixed Spanish, French and Indian blood living in certain sections of old Florida; at the age of sixteen she had developed into a beautiful young girl showing the strain of Indian blood only in her dark complexion and jet black hair. About that time Wilfred North, the son of a rich miner, met her on one of his hunting trips and fell violently in love with her. Soon they were secretly married. But North quickly tired of his pretty but ignorant wife and at the time of the opening of our picture he had located her and their baby in a small cabin near the city where he lives as a bachelor.

Scene 1. Married Beneath His Station.—At the opening of the first scene we find the wife and baby in front of the little cabin which is her home. Neglected by her husband, all the love of her warm Southern nature is lavished on the little one. Every few moments she leaves her household duties to caress it. Now North, the husband, approaches the little home. He has ridden over from the city. His wife greets him eagerly, but he repulses her caress and asks for a glas of water. She places the baby in his arms. But he is indifferent to it and seats it on the floor of the porch. The wife returns with the water. After drinking it he draws forth his wallet and grudgingly gives her the money necessary for her modest needs. Without any show of affection he starts to leave. The wife looks after him, the tears showing in her eyes. North drops his handkerchief. The wife rushes forward, picks it up and covers it with passionate kisses. Then she sadly returns and picks up her one solace, the baby.

Scene 2. The Wife's Innocent Rival—A Jaunt on Horseback.

Scene 3. At the Fortune Teller's.—Back in the pine forests we find the cabin of Old Mammy Williams. No one, not even Mammy, knows her real age. Here she has lived since slavery times supported mainly by the charity of the surrounding planters. It is here the young girls come to have their fortune told by old Mammy. Here comes Miss Evelyn and North. Mammy Williams greets Miss Evelyn warmly, for many a basket of good things has found its way to her cabin from the Weston home. Miss Evelyn tells of her desire to have her fortune told, Mammy gets the coffee cup and instructs Miss Evelyn in the routine she follows. But on looking at the grounds, Mammy's face becomes grave. She sees trouble for Miss Evelyn and all on account of the man standing near. She tells Miss Evelyn of her fears and orders North to leave. But North laughs at Mammy and soon induces Miss Evelyn to pay no attention to the ignorant superstition of the old Mammy. Laughingly they leave, while Mammy looks after them with fear in her kindly old eyes for Miss Evelyn's future happiness.

Scene 4. Mother and the Child.—Along the footpath leading through the Southern pines to her little cabin home comes the neglected wife. Carrying her bundle on her head in the manner of her ancestors, she leads the baby by the hand.

Scene 5. His Vows Forgotten.—Now the mother and child arrive at a point where the path she is following crosses one of the numerous lanes running through the forest. Weary from her long walk she places the bundle on the ground and seats the child on it. Suddenly she hears the thud of feet of approaching horses. Down the lane come North and Miss Evelyn returning from their visit to the fortune teller. Miss Evelyn is slightly in the lead. The poor neglected wife sees the husband she still loves and rushes forward to speak to him, holding out the baby for him to caress. North only pulls up his horse enough to allow Miss Evelyn to get out of hearing then brutally ignoring the wife standing in front, he urges his horse forward and almost running her down, he passes on to overtake Miss Evelyn, not even turning his head for a look at his poor wife standing watching him so sorrowfully.

Scene 6. A Proposal.

Scene 7. The Family, Unaware of the Previous Marriage, Approve.

Scene 8. The Wife Spurned.—Back at the little cabin we find the poor wife and baby. Suddenly North rushes in and begins to upbraid his wife for having dared to attempt to stop him that afternoon in the woods. The wife first places the little one in the house out of danger and returns to North. At first she patiently pleads with him, then the thought of the beautiful girl she has seen with him rouses her jealousy and she threatens to inform the girl of his marriage. Crazed with anger and fear, North brutally strikes her down and rushes away. The poor wife slowly revives from his cowardly blow, while the little one toddles forward to find out why his mother is lying on the ground.

Scene 9. Almost a Bigamist—The Challenge.—It is Miss Evelyn's wedding day. Suddenly in rushes North's real wife. She has heard of his intended marriage and comes to prevent it. Alarmed at the noise, the father, mother and brother come rushing from the house. At first they do not believe the poor wife's story and order her from the place. But she produces her baby boy and they are soon convinced of the truth of her story. Angered at such an insult to their proud old Southern name, young Weston steps forward and, striking North a blow across the face with his glove, challenges him to a duel.

Scene 10. The Duel—The Wife's Sacrifice.—Out in a small opening in the tropical forest where the sun's rays come slanting down through the hanging grey moss, the dueling place has been located. Here comes young Weston and his second. Close on their heels arrive North and his second. Introduction follows, and soon the pistols are examined and given to the principals. Now they take their places. The second begins his count. One-two-three-four-five! Two shots ring out on the still morning air. But a second before a woman dashes in between the duelists and falls. One of the bullets has found a mark. It is North's poor wife. She has followed him, and faithful to the last, has saved him from death. Overcome with remose, North takes his little baby boy in his arms and, kneeling over the body of his wife, weeps convulsively, while Weston and the seconds stand by with uncovered heads.

THE CRIPPLE'S MARRIAGE.—The principal characters in this remarkable comedy hit are a cripple minus his legs, and a tall spinster. The cripple falls in love with the lady but is scorned by her. His devotion is so great, however, that he performs a very daring feet, which argument is so strong that her objections are overcome and she consents to a speedy marriage. The wedding march, the court room scene, the supper and the return to the new home are all features bound to create boundless hilarity. Approximate length, 522 feet.

THE GOOD OMEN.—Mistletoe has ever been the emblem of good luck and from time immemorial the branch of mistletoe has been the hope of the fair sex. In this series of views the spell is broken and in quick succession one catastrophe follows another to the utmost consternation of the peddler and his many patrons, who lose all faith in the proverbial advantages of the plant. Many very amusing scenes are created—bound to please everybody. Approximate length, 413 feet.

SAVED FROM CONVICTION.—A strong feature subject. The woodman engaged at his labor meets with an accident, suffering a cut on his hand. His son bringing the noonday meal to him is spreading the lunch while the father goes to the creek to wash his hand. During his absence a tramp steals the ax and through threats prevents the boy from making an outcry.

The accident to the father's hand is worse than at first appeared to be the case and he returns to his home with the boy.

Soon after it is discovered that the town collector has been felled and robbed. The weapon with which the crime was committed is found on the ground and proves a clue to the murder. The woodman denies all knowledge of or participation in the affair, but the accident to his hand, the blood on his trousers, all are taken as circumstantial evidence upon which a case is built up and vigorously prosecuted. The woodman's son has faith in his father and goes to Paris to appeal to the higher authorities. No one takes interest in the little fellow's troubles and tired and discouraged he lies down on a park seat to rest. He is rudely awakened by the police and a number of sympathetic people gather to hear his story and among them the sharp eye of the lad detects the disguised features of the man who stole his father's ax. He makes the accusation and the man is taken into custody. At the station they find other evidence on his person that he is guilty of the crime charged to the woodman. The police telephone the home town of the boy and the Prefect rushes into the court room just as the judge is about to pass sentence upon the innocent, convicted prisoner. Approximate length, 812 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine)

TENDER CORDS.—The little daughter of an artisan falls from the window and is killed. With the life of the child the happiness also passes from the once cheerful and happy home. Relations become strained, the husband, disconsolate, seeks comfort in the flowing bowl and the heartbroken wife is thrown upon her own resources for a livelihood. The burden weighs heavily upon the woman and she is finally compelled to seek separation. The couple conclude to divide the household effects and are assorting the clothes when an argument over the garments of the dead child touches the tender heart-strings of both, and anger once more gives way to love. The estranged are reunited and the memory of the departed hovers about the home like a dove of peace.

Perfect dramatization and photographic quality. Approximate length, 628 feet.

MAGIC CARPET.—Amusing and entertaining throughout. The opening scene is in the Orient, and shows the Turk seated on a carpet, which magically carries him through the air to his destination. A vagrant steals the carpet and for his folly is scared almost to death by the magic powers exerted upon him. Numerous very exciting experiences are made by the police, a maid and others before the carpet again comes into possession of the Turk, who, greatly elated, soars away on his inanimate and magic steed.

Some very bewildering effects are produced and everyone will be pleased with the entire presentation. Approximate length, 357 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

AN UNINVITED GUEST.—A daring footpad attacks a man on the highway and, after relieving the latter of all his valuables, the culprit makes his escape. The victim calls for help and soon a policeman is on the scene. The latter upon hearing of the robbery starts in pursuit of the fugutive, who manages to keep a fair distance ahead. Finally coming to a house where there is a ladder leaning against the wall, the thief mounts the ladder and climbs up, entering a window of an apartment. A fancy dress ball is being held in the place and as all the guests are dressed in grotesque costumes it is easily understood how they mistake the thug for one of the party and as he comes through the window they all enjoy the quaint entrance immensely and proceed to have a jolly time with the strange looking creature. He is at a loss to know the cause of the effusive welcome and all the times keeps his eye on the window lest his pursuers would enter and catch him. Finally he spies the policeman and without losing his gravity, he gracefully retires from the gathering, and going to the cloak room he puts on a fine fur-lined coat, after which he walks passively out of the place. The cop at this juncture comes in through the window and when he explains his mission the rest of the party join him and they all start out to catch the thief. They come upon him hanging on a picket fence, where two other footpads have put him after relieving him of his fur coat and all his spoils. Length, 417 feet.

SAVED BY A WAIF.—This very pathetic picture, in which a little girl plays the principal part with great skill, shows the interior of a home where the kind hearted father and mother are watching at the bedside of their sick child. The little one is stricken with a serious illness and although every available remedy known to medical science has been tried, the child passes away in her heart-broken mother's arms. The latter feeling her bereavement to such an extent loses her reason and we see her as she sits in her lonely home thinking of her dear departed one, and although her kind husband does everything to divert her mind from the memory of her great sorrow it is without effect, for the stricken woman is beyond aid. The doctor gives her up as a hopeless case, but tells her husband that she might be saved if they could deceive her by replacing the dead child by another, but this seems entirely out of the question, until one day while going down the street the doctor comes upon a little ragamuffin who resembles the departed child very much. After giving the youngster a little change he induces her to accompany him to the home of the invalid, where the waif is dressed in the clothes of the dead child. Going then to the stricken woman they lead her into the room where the little girl is waiting and the shock has its desired effect, for the happy woman regains her reason and clasps the little one to her heart.

At the home of the little waif her poor old parents are beginning to worry about her prolonged absence and are at their wits' end, when suddenly the door opens and there stands their child dressed in beautiful clothes and accompanied by her benefactors, who, after explaining the situation to the old people, receive their consent to adopt the little one to take the place of their dead darling. The novery stricken couple are made comfortable for life through the bargain, for they receive a very large sum of money. Length, 712 feet.

MAKING TAMBOURINES.—The use of tambourines in many different ways makes the manufacturing of these instruments a very important and lucrative industry. In this picture we get a vivid idea of the skill required in making them, and we see the workmen engaged in the task from the time that the frame is cut from the rough wood until they receive the finishing touches. Some are extremely plain, while others are very artistically decorated and display great skill in workmanship. The last picture shows how they are used in sunny Italy where we enjoy a beautiful tarantella danced by the natives and each strums on the tambourine keeping time with the strains of the music. Length, 266 feet.

ADVANTAGES OF AVIATION.—This funny picture is a clever satire upon the possibilities of using the aeroplane as a means of travel. Length, 522 feet.

A BRUISED HEART.—A young man and his fiance enter the former's auto and are driven to a fashionable cafe where it is their custom to spend their evenings in search of diversion. As they enter the place the young woman catches sight of one of her old admirers and without letting her companion see her, she bows slightly to the man and passes on to the dressing room. When they have removed their wraps the youth joins some of his friends in the conservatory while the maiden enters the drawing room to greet some of her acquaintances. The young man happens to look through a window and there, to his amazement and horror, he sees his fiance go over to the stranger, who is seated at a table, and like old friends, their greeting is most effusive, and the man kisses the young woman. So terribly is the young lover affected by what his eyes have just seen that he bolts from the place, leaving his unfaithful one with the one whom she loves.

We next see the heart-broken youth some time later when he is struggling to forget his loved one, and while out strolling with some friends he happens to meet her in the company of his rival. So furious does he become that he strikes at the man, only to receive harsh treatment in the latter's hands and to have his old love turn her back in scorn upon him. So trying is the ordeal that he leaves his friends and wanders away to a remote part of the road, where, pulling a gun from his pocket, he tries to die. The bullet, however, only inflicts a serious wound and he is removed to his home where, in his delirium, he calls for his faithless one. She is summoned and when she reaches his bedside her presence has the wounderful influence over the wounded lover and he immediately revives and explains the cause of his rash act to the tearful and penitent woman who, realizing her mistake, promises only to love and honor him in the future. Length, 492 feet.

CARNIVAL AT NICE, 1909.—This great carnival is a yearly event and is held the week preceding the beginning of the Lenten season, the magnitude of which can only be appreciated by seeing this picture, which was taken during the big parade. A vast amount of money is expended in making this celebration an epoch in the history of the city and prizes are offered to the different participants, who are all dressed in costumes, some beautiful, while others are extremely grotesque.

PROTECTOR OF ANIMALS.—An ingenious chemist has discovered a marvelous fluid which will enable him to be of great assistance to the humane society, for every dead animal or bird which receives a few drops of the magic fluid becomes animated and restored to its natural state

SOLDIER'S HEART.—A young lieutenant is betrothed to a pretty maiden and during the reception given in their honor the prospective bridegroom receives a note, and without explaining the contents, he excuses himself and retires from the assemblage, leaving his friends in a great state of perplexity as to the nature of his sudden departure. His fiance becomes very suspicious and jumps to the conclusion that there is a woman in the case, and egged on by another admirer, who is in hopes of winning her hand, she decides to ferret out the true state of affairs. The latter fellow volunteers to aid her in her trouble, so goes to the apartment of the young lieutenant to keep a lookout for serious complications. He listens at the door and is sure that he hears the voice of a woman, so hastening to the home of the grief-stricken maiden he tells her and her father of his discovery. The enraged old man and the girl accompany the volunteer detective to the lieutenant's apartment and take the latter by surprise, but after explaining the nature of their visit, their curiosity is soon obviated, for the youth produces the note, which is a line from his mother, stating that she is coming to town, and asking her son to meet her. To substantiate his declaration he calls the old lady from the next room and the latter comes forward and is introduced to her future daughter-in-law, while the busybody detective is turned out of the place. Length, 489 feet.

GAMBLER'S HONOR.—A rough-and-ready fellow sits at the gambling table until his last cent is gone, and already being in debt to one of his friends, his credit is no longer good, so he leaves the place and goes home. Arriving there he meets with a cold reception from his wife, who strongly remonstrates with him. In the heat of the altercation a messenger enters with a note and the domineering wife opens the missive and to her horror learns that it is from one of his friends demanding the payment of a gambling debt. She refuses to help him out of the trying situation and to make sure that he will not get hold of the money she takes it from the drawer and goes out, locking the unfortunate fellow in. Realizing that a gambling debt is a debt of honor, the man tries every way to scrape up enough coin to go and pay it, but without success; at last he spies the clock and candlesticks and hits upon a scheme whereby he will save himself. He takes the goods and climbing out through the window goes to a pawn shop where he pledges them for a small loan, after which he returns to the gambling den. In the meantime his wife comes into the room and when she discovers the loss of the ornaments she becomes wild with terror and starts out to find her husband. Coming to the gambling den she thinks that she will give him a dose of his own medicine, so sitting herself at the table she orders up a lot of drinks and enjoys herself to her heart's content until finally the husband, realizing his great mistake in treating his wife so shamefully, leaves the place with her, vowing to turn over a new leaf. Length, 259 feet.

THE LOST HEIRESS.—The governess takes the little girl for a walk. While sitting on the water's edge the little girl walks away to the hot-house, where she falls asleep. As soon as the governess misses her little charge she gives an alarm. Father and mother and all the servants start on a search. A colored man who stole chickens which he carries in a sack is approached. Thinking his theft has been discovered, he runs away and is chased by the crowd and cornered. When the chickens are found he is given a good trouncing. A fat colored woman does not fare any better. Two tramps who stole a dog meet a like fate.

When the searching party gives up all hope the gardener discovers the little girl asleep in the hothouse and caries her back to the arms of the delighted parents. Length, 580 feet.

FATHER'S GLUE.—Two boys watch father as he mends things with a most excellent glue which he has prepared. They decide to have some fun with father's glue, and start on a mischievous trip.

They first spread the glue on a bench in the park, which bench is soon occupied by a young couple. When the lover tries to rise he finds he is stuck to the bench. He is pulled away after great damage to his trousers.

The mischievous boys play many more tricks on men and women who all take up the chase. The boys spread the glue over the sidewalk and then run. They are pursued by a crowd who all lose their shoes while running over the glue.

At last the boys are caught in their own trap. They are glued to the fence and given a good trouncing. Judging from their smiling countenances, the fun was worth the licking they received. Length, 320 feet.

ARE YOU THE MAN?—A mischievous member of a club proposes the following bet: "I bet $500 that you cannot ask the first ten men you meet the simple question, 'ARE YOU THE MAN?' without being insulted." One after another reads the paper with great laughter. At last one member accepts the bet and starts out at once to carry it out. The hasty party is soon sorry to have accepted the proposition as he meets with a severe punishment from every one he approaches. When at last in danger of being arrested, he throws up his hands saying, "I give up."

His friends who accompanied him on the trip explain matters to the policeman and with great laughter the party is wheeled to the club house upon a pushcart. He acknowledges "I AM THE MAN" and pays his debt vowing never to accept another bet. Length, 500 feet.

MY FRIEND, THE INDIAN.—An Indian coming into town asks for a drink. A hobo seeing a chance for fun, sells the Indian to a cigar man as a cigar sign. The trouble soon begins. The Indian runs away and a chase follows as novel as it is funny.

At last the Indian is caught. He jumps through a chimney into a bedroom and conceals himself in a folding bed. Six policemen who are chasing him close up the folding bed and carry the prisoner away. On the street the bed breaks through, the Indian escapes, while the policemen carry the empty bed in triumph to the station. Length, 345 feet.

FIGHTING BOB.—Lieutenant Robert Willard, known to all his friends as "Fighting Bob," meets the daughter of a wealthy merchant, while his ship is at anchor in one of the small Mexican ports, and is so struck by her beauty that he falls desperately in love with her and she with him.

Now the senor, her father, has other plans for his daughter and is not overpleased at the prospect of an alliance with the dashing young American officer—in fact he has long cherished a desire to unite his fortune with that of Don Sancho de Salvatore, a man of noble blood and vast estates.

Bob has arranged to meet his fair one at an appointed time and the hour has scarcely struck when through the gates strides the dauntless young lieutenant. He is not aware of a pair of evil eyes that follow him. Don Salvatore, already aware of the success of his rival's suit, has placed a spy near his friend's abode to keep close watch on the fair senorita and the hated Americano.

Hurrying to the home of Don Salvatore, Pedro, the spy, acquaints the Don with the news that Bob is already within the gates of Cavera's home and perhaps is even now making desperate love to the daughter. With an oath the jealous suitor seizes his sombrero and hastens away to interrupt the lieutenant in his love making. In the meantime Don Cavera has discovered the presence of the two lovers in the garden and is angrily upbraiding his daughter for daring to bring a stranger within his gates, unknown to him, when Salvatore arrives. Now we are given a little exhibition of the senorita's spirit and the American's nerve, when the father and jealous suitor are both told that in spite of them Senorita Magdalena would become the wife of Robert Willard if he had to wade through fire and water to accomplish that end. Kissing his sweetheart good-night before the dumbfounded Dons and lifting his cap to Senora Cavera, Magdalena's mother, Bob strides away, vowing that if necessary he would fight for his lady love as did the knights of old. Returning to his ship he sends a middy with a message to the Senorita telling her to meet him near the walls of the old Cabrillado that evening at 1 o'clock, when they would at once repair to the church and by the good father be made one.

Together they hurry to the old church and their marriage is soon consummated. But the watchful Pedro overhears enough of their plans to divine the rest and loses no time in bearing the news to his master. Boiling with rage, Don Salvatore secures the services of two policemen and hastens to the wharf. They are just in time to overtake the wedding party as they are boarding the ship's launch. The police attempt to seize the senorita, but they did not reckon on the presence of a squad of Yankee tars, who would follow Bob into the jaws of death, if necessary, and it only takes a word from him to set that bunch of sailors in action. Springing up in all directions, Bob's boys soon overpower the police, and lifting them above their heads, send them floundering out into the water. "You shall answer for this indignity," screams the now maddened Salvatore, but before he has time to say another word the jolly tars send him sprawling after the police, who are by this time swimming as fast as they can out of danger. Springing on the launch, a ringing cheer is sent up for the Yankee lieutenant and his beautiful bride.

Bob secures a leave of absence from duty, and when his ship drops anchor in an American port, he and his young wife proceed to enjoy the honeymoon that the brave and fair so richly merit. Length, 995 feet.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph 1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

THE TRUER LOVER.—A struggling young artist working rather listlessly in his studio, suddenly jumps up, puts on his hat and coat and goes out. He proceeds to the home of a young lady with whom he is deeply in love. She receives his proposals of marriage in an indifferent manner, finally promises to marry him when he has amassed a fortune. The young man is overjoyed, returns to his studio and is hard at work when a model, a poor but pretty woman, enters with her little daughter. They take their position on a pedestal when suddenly the woman staggers and falls. The artist assists her to the couch, gives her a stimulant and she partially revives. She realizes, however, that she has but a short time to live and begs the artist to care for her little child. He grants the request and solemnly swears to care for her little one as the mother passes away.

Returning to the artist's sweetheart we find a wealthy elderly suitor urging her to become his wife and supplementing his protestations of love by presenting her with jewelry. She besitates for a while, then forgetting her former promise, agrees to marry the man of wealth. She goes at once to the artist's studio to break the engagement. The young man greets her rapturously, the young lady noticing the adopted child, sees a way to break the engagement without attaching blame to herself. The artist tries to explain, but without success. He is told to choose between the young lady and the child and when he refuses to turn the orphan out, his engagement ring and freedom is given him.

A lapse of ten years has brought many changes. The orphan has grown to a beautiful girl of 18, while fortune has been kind to the artist. We find the pair in their very handsome home as the butler enters and announces a caller. The lady, upon being ushered in, proves to be the artist's fiancee of ten years before, now a widow. He courteously but formally bids her welcome. She at once makes ardent love to the artist who plainly shows his displeasure and repulses her advances. Thereupon the widow leaves the room in anger and the young lady, entering and noticing the artist's embarrassment, asks the meaning of it and is told of the incident. Relief and joy at once beam from the girl's eyes, the artist reads in her expression her love for him, takes her in his arms and asks her to become his wife. Length, 575 feet.

THE ORIENTAL MYSTIC.—Miss Weatherby, a maiden lady of uncertain years, is interrupted in her work by the sudden entrance of Omar, a Turkish lace vendor, into the room. At the same time her niece, Gwendoline, enters and the Turk is immediately struck by her beauty. The girl becomes frightened at his queer actions, screams and a couple of policemen rush in and attempt to arrest the Turk. He dives between their legs, runs through the hallway, stops before a hall rack and disappears from view. The officers search the entire house, but find no trace of him. Shortly afterward a servant in dusting the furniture comes to the rack and is frightened at the sight of Omar issuing apparently from the mirror. The police again appear, but Omar evades them by vanishing through or into another mirror. They can see him plainly, but at the same time are unable to catch him. Leaving the house and walking down the street the Turk comes upon a woman carrying a dress suit case. She drops it on the ground for a moment, Omar jumps inside and is carried away. By a strange coincidence the lady goes to Miss Weatherby's and opens the suit case. Omar jumps out and is surprised to find himself back to his original starting place. He turns round and round against the wall leaving a Turkish pattern in his wake and at the same time disappearing. The officers are again called, roll up the pattern and finally secure the elusive Turk. They overpower him, put handcuffs on and start to drag him off when again he disappears, leaving only his clothes in their hands. The policemen are scared to death, leave the house; the clothes rolled up in a ball and roll out of the room. The house maid comes out and sees the rug, as she thinks it, hangs it on the clothes line and commences beating it. She is surprised and likewise frightened as she sees Omar hanging on the line a captive. She calls the officers, who take the Turk, much to his chagrin and the joy of the women. Length, 395 feet.

On her awakening she is surprised to find the money, and walking along she meets another poor woman and child, with whom she divides her happiness.

SERVANT.—A poor girl leaves home to seek work and bids good-bye to her sweetheart. She finally gets work on a farm and the farmer's son falls in love with her. However, he is caught by his father and the girl is discharged. The poor girl's former sweetheart starts out in search of her and finds her on the roadside and takes her home again. Length, 485 feet.

BLIND FARMER.—Shows a blind man's daughter who falls in love with one of the farm help and he asks for her hand, and gets his consent. He is sent to the market with a cow, but on the way he meets some friends in a tavern, who are gambling, and loses the cow. He returns and is later forgiven by the blind farmer. Length, 650 feet.

LITTLE MOTHER.—Shows a beautiful country scene. A mother gets ill and her child takes her place; such as feeding the chickens, milking the cows, going to market, and getting dinner ready for the help. Length, 600 feet.

SWEETHEART'S CHRISTMAS.—Shows a young man starting out to his sweetheart's home. On the way he meets some friends. They have a few drinks and he becomes intoxicated. He buys some Christmas presents to take with him, but unable to carry them he gets into a street cleaner's basket, who carries him to the house. They see he is intoxicated and throw him out. Length, 400 feet.

DR. CLOWN.—A little girl is sick and the doctor prescribes a medicine. The child, in a vision, sees a clown performing tricks and is enraptured. When she wakes up and finds it all a dream she makes her mother go out and find a real clown, which she does in a theater and brings him home and the little girl gets well. Length, 550 feet.

TELLTALE GRAPHOPHONE.—A girl refuses to marry a fellow and he seeks revenge, so he enters the house at night and kidnaps her, but through their grahpophone he is discovered and found guilty and arrested. Length, 545 feet.

GRIP IN THE FAMILY.—Shows a whole family having the grip. The doctor prescribes some medicine which is inspiring to all who use it. Very funny situations are seen in this picture. Length, 560 feet.

TROUBLES OF A FISHERMAN.—Two fishermen are sitting fishing in a brook. One of them has good luck, and the other one, while pulling on his line gets over to the other side of the fence onto a rooster, which results in fishing roosters. Length, 215 feet.

MASQUERADE COSTUME.—A man and his wife get ready to go to a masquerade. He dresses himself up as a bear and when he is leaving the house he scares the tenants, who summon the police, who finally find out it is only a man in bear costume. Length, 330 feet.

FLAT HUNTING.—A man is looking for a room, while the tenants are still occupying the same. He turns everything upside down in order to see the flat. Length, 285 feet.

DOG AND BABY.—Shows a dog attached to a baby carriage, the baby, as usual, going out for a drive. One day a tramp comes along and steals the dog, and a big chase follows, but the dog is finally caught and the tramp given a good beating. Length, 325 feet.

MIRACLE OF LOVE.—Picture shows a happy family eating dinner. The father goes out and has a good time, while his little girl gets sick, and on her death bed they send a servant to find the father, who finds him intoxicated. He tells him of his child's illness and he hurries home. He, being a doctor, restores the child's health. Length, 750 feet.

LIFE OF A WOOD ANT.—This is a very interesting picture, showing how ants live, also some trained ants. Length, 350 feet.

GRAND STAG HUNTING.—Shows his Majesty going out hunting and his wonderful dogs; how they capture stag; also shows how well they are trained. Beautiful scenery makes this one of the best pictures of this kind ever seen. Length, 400 feet.

POOR LIFE.—Shows a poor family. The father takes his two children with him out begging. He treats them brutally and they run away from him and are finally found in some snow banks by friends, who pick them up and take them back to their mother, who is very happy upon their return. Length, 450 feet.

THE MASTER DETECTIVE, PAT CORNER.—As the bank watch is inspecting the cellar vaults, where the gold supply of the bank is kept, he suddenly hears the sound of steady strokes on one of the walls. At first he will not believe this to be true, but he soon understands that somebody is trying to reach the gold supply. The bank director is immediately sent for, and at once appearing, he soon ascertains that danger is imminent. In order to keep the case quiet, he does not inform the police, but seeks the assistance of the famous detective, Pat Corner, who promises to take the case in charge. A design of the bank and the nearest surroundings shows quickly to the acute detective that a subterranean passage to the bank must originate from a public house in the neighborhood. He at once sets to work to examine this public house, and in an old barn adjoining the bank he finds the entrance to a subterranean passage. The landlord tells him that an old blind beggar by the name of Teddy sometimes is allowed to take refuge in the barn during the night, and Pat Corner's next thing to do is now to find Teddy, who lives in an old, decayed house in the city. Teddy plays his part as blind man and cripple so well that the detective leaves him, quite bewildered, not knowing what to think, but when he comes back, one moment later, Teddy has disappeared. As Pat Corner cannot find the secret entrance to the fox's den, he fetches his assistant and tells him to keep watch, while he himself examines the surrounding yards, trying to find another entrance. When he comes back his assistant has also disappeared. After a close examination Pat Corner finds at last a place in the wall where he thinks the secret entrance might be found. He quickly fetches three policemen and they have the wall blown up with dynamite. Pat Corner is just in time to save his assistant from a terrible death and to arrest Teddy and his accomplice, thus preventing them from doing further mischief.

THE FROLICKING YOUTHS.—An extraordinary college escapade. Bobby White, a young college student, whose aspirations run more in the development of his mentality, rather than his animality, is discovered studying in his den, regardless of the chatter of his athletic inclined classmates, as one of the young athletes rushes in, who has just made the track team, to tell his classmates of his good fortune. They all show much enthusiasm, but Bobbie, wishing to complete his studies, makes a few sarcastic remarks about athletics in general which inflames the young athletes and they start a rough house. Bobbie's roommate, Billie Brown, comes on the scene and puts a stop to the noise. Billie, who is always conceiving some wondrous scheme to drive away dull care, suggests to Bobbie that he attire himself as a lady and come with him to his sweetheart's home, and be introduced as his sister.

They meet Billie's sweetheart, Grace Goodman, driving her auto. She stops and Bobbie is introduced as Billie's sister. Grace at once takes a fancy to Bobbie, not knowing the deception, and invites him to take the seat beside her. Then Billie's troubles begin. They drive to Grace's home, arriving, they enter; Bobbie sits on the sofa, Grace beside him; Billie is left to sit on a chair. Bobbie and Grace talk on girlish things, and show much affection, which enrages Billie, but he is afraid to interfere for fear that Grace will be angry with him for his perfidy. Grace asks him to enter her room and Bobbie goes, and this is all that Billie can stand, he has reached the limit of his endurance and must have revenge or burst with pent up rage. He hears them coming out, thinking that Bobbie will lead he strikes the first one with a sofa pillow, which proves to Billie's dismay to be Grace, who at once becomes very indignant and refuses to listen to Billie's explanation, rushes out, calls her father, who comes in just in time to see Billie throw Bobbie on the sofa and strike him. The old gentleman, thinking Bobbie a girl, falls upon Billie like an enraged lion whose mate is being overcome by some beastly foe and ousts him from the house while Grace and her mother try to pacify Bobbie, who has assumed the look of injured innocence and a badly used sister. In being ousted from the house Billie falls into the arms of a policeman.

Arriving at the station house the officer makes his complaint and has Grace, her father and mother tell their story of the assault upon Bobbie. Bobbie is seized. Billie makes for him and Grace goes to the aid of her newly made friend, steps on Bobbie's skirt and off it comes and the secret is out, the women are shocked, the men horror stricken. Bobbie looks foolish, Billie pleased, the men steal a sly glance and see the joke, they are amazed at first but soon see through the escapade. Billie refuses to listen to Grace who wishes to make it up. He is finally persuaded by Grace's father, and also to make friends with Bobbie. Length, 1,000 feet.

Come Out of It, Mr. Exhibitor!

Bitterly sore because they have seen me pass them in the race for supremacy and become the largest and best film renter in the world, several film exchanges are now making an attack on me. They haven't any more nerve than the Lord gave little kittens, so they confine their attacks to personal letters, marked "confidential." And what do you think the frightful charge is that they lay against me? Picking pockets? No, worse than that. Robbery? No, worse than that. Murder? No, far worse than that. Then what on earth is this horrible accusation? Listen, here it is: They say "Laemmle is a hot-air advertiser." Isn't it awful? Doesn't it curdle the very gizzard of your soul? Do they charge that my films are not good? No, because they know that you know better. They know that you know that I am now the greatest film renter in the world solely because of quality. And who are the people who charge me with "hot-air advertising?" Why, they are simply the folks who used to be a big power in the film field until I jumped into the game less than three years ago and put the kibosh on them. Since I turned independent, I have increased my business 90 per cent. It is the most terrific demonstration of faith ever given by the exhibitors of America to any renter. They have taken my word that the independent films are masterpieces of photography, ingenious in conception and perfect in execution. They have taken my word that the license game is but a trick of the Trust, and a most palpable trick at that. If any one writes you a letter, lying about me, please ask him why he hasn't the nerve to come out in the open. Ask him to lay his finger on any one single blot in my whole career as a renter. Ask him if he is doing as much for the exhibitors as I am. Ask him who it is that has given the Trust some jolts that it will never forget. Ask him if he really thinks it is possible to give a better service than the Laemmle offices are giving. And then ask him if hot-air advertising alone would build up the greatest film renting business in the world in less than three years' time. Meanwhile ask yourself this one question: "Am I going to pay $2 a week every week I am in the business for the right to run my own theater and use my own goods?"

EXTRA

Carl Laemmle Becomes a Film Manufacturer, Organizes a New Company to Be Totally Separate from The Laemmle Film Service. Will Make a Tremendous Specialty of American Subjects.

I am going to manufacture films.

I will make American subjects my specialty.

To do this I have incorporated a new company to be conducted entirely separate and distinct from the Laemmle Film Service.

Those of you who have read between the lines of my advertising in the past few years have probably long suspected that manufacturing has been my ambition.

About a year ago I was making arrangements to open a manufacturing plant in Canada, but was stopped by a threat from the film trust to the effect that if I became a manufacturer they would discontinue selling films to the Laemmle Film Service.

At that time the Independent movement had not been organized, so I did not dare jeopardize my film service and its customers. So I dropped my project temporarily.

I am now ready to go ahead, not on a half-hearted basis, but with all my heart and soul. Permit me to state here that I have no stock for sale in my new company.

Now, then, there are several important things I want everyone to read.

I WANT THE BEST TALENT.

I will pay the highest salaries in order to secure the services of the best experts in the world. I want the best moving picture photographers, stage managers and professionals in the world.

I offer the chance of a lifetime to those men who enter my employ. I will not only pay unparalleled salaries, but I will give the right men an interest in the business. I will give them stock in the new corporation and let the stock pay for itself out of the profits.

You know what a success I have made of the renting business. You know there is not a parallel to it in the whole history of moving pictures. I am going to do the same thing in the manufacturing end and I have all the resources I can possibly make use of.

Write to me and I will keep your communication absolutely secret, no matter whom you are working for now, and no matter whether we close a deal or not.

I don't wan you unless you are the best in your line. And you don't want me unless I give you a better proposition than you now have.

I WANT GOOD MANUSCRIPTS.

I want the best moving picture playwrights to submit their manuscripts and scenarios at once, with the distinct understanding that I will pay the highest market price for all I accept. Understand, also, that I want strong, virile American subjects or typical American comics. I am going to make American ideas my strong play.

MY EUROPEAN CONNECTIONS.

I am about to visit Paris, London, Berlin and other centers of Europe in order to make arrangements for marketing my product there as well as in America. I will employ regular representatives at all those points, if necessary, and make it a worldwide movement.

NOTICE TO FILM EXCHANGES.

I give my word of honor to all Independent film renters that I will deal with them, as a manufacturer, precisely the same as I shall deal with the Laemmle Film Service.

I will run the two companies on their own separate basis. I will charge the Laemmle Film Service exactly as much for film as I charge you and will fix a simultaneous release date on all subjects. This is the only way I can hope or expect you to handle the product of my manufacturing concern. As an evidence of good faith, I am not even going to use the name Laemmle on the films I manufacture. Naturally I would like to, but I can see why renters would not care to peddle out films bearing the name of a renting competitor.

Those of the renters who feel friendly toward me will not be asked to buy films on any basis other than pure merit. I am going to exert herculean efforts to produce films that you will be glad to handle. And I see no reason why I can't do this as well as anyone else.

I WANT A GOOD COMPANY NAME.

I am incorporating under the name of "Yankee Films Company," but I believe the name can be improved upon.

So I will pay $25 for the best suggestion for a company name. Your suggestion must reach me by June 18th at latest.

In sending your suggestion remember these points: That the name Laemmle must not be part of it; that I am going to feature American subjects; that the name should be as short as possible and easy to remember.

This contest is open to everyone who reads this advertisement, man, woman or child, whether connected with the moving picture business or not. All I want is a name, but even if I don't get a good one from the suggestions sent in, I will pay the $25.00 to whoever sends in the best one, paying for it whether I use it or not.

Very sincerely yours,

CARL LAEMMLE

IMPORTANT:—All communications in answer to the above should be addressed "Carl Laemmle, 196 Lake St., Chicago" and marked "PRIVATE."

The Violin Maker of Cremona

The Powerful influence of the Greater Love

This subject is particularly high quality as to story, acting aud photographic quality, the story being intensely interesting and acted in such a convincing manner as to place the picture in a class by itself, while the photographic effects are marvelous. The scene is laid in Cremona, Italy, the home of the violin, and shows the self-sacrificing love of a cripple violin maker, an expert in the art, who rather than make the girl he loves unhappy, smashes to bits the result of his handiwork, thereby yielding the hand of the girl to the one she loves. Despairing at his loss, he is contented with the thought that he had made her happy,

GAUMONT FILMS

GEORGE KLEINE

Licensed by Motion Picture Patents Co.

"A Mother's Choice"

Drama. Approx. Length, 806 Feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, JUNE 8, 1909.

In a beautiful villa, at the Riviera, a young and attractive widow and her son make their home.

The attentions of a gentleman caller are being accepted by the young woman, and when the latter proposes marriage he is looked upon with favor. The little lad, however, cannot bear to think of another taking his father's place and shows a marked lack of confidence in the gentleman. Accordingly a distant college is suggested and the little fellow taken thereto for his education. One night the boy leaves the institution to return to his home, where he arrives foot-sore and almost starved. The father is about to eject him when the mother appears and intervenes herself. Forced to make a definite choice the woman chooses her son and the man departs. Son and mother are again left to share their joy and sorrow. Excellent action and well dramatized.

"A Strong Diet"

RELEASED, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1909.

Having served a sumptuous meal the hostess announces to the guests that she has served them bull steak. One of the guests, seeing an opportunity for some innocent amusement, appropriates a pair of mounted horns, which he attaches to his head. Consternation overcomes the party and all hasten from the room, upsetting everything in their anxiety to get out of harm's way. On the street the man creates wild excitement by his actions and the police, unable to apprehend the fellow, telegraph to Spain and a "cuadrilla," a corps of bull-fighters, is sent on to Paris. A novel feature is that the message as transmitted over the wires is in full view of the audience. The humorist makes a stubborn fight but finally gives up.

Full of splendid action and perfect quality and detail throughout.

"Historical Fan"

COLORING EXTRA, $7.25

Panoramic. Approx. Length, 278 Feet.

RELEASED, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1909.

A delightfully pleasing and beautifully hand-colored series of panoramic views, giving the history of the fan. A large ostrich feather fan opens and closes alternately, showing each time a different scene and the various styles of fans in use throughout ages and by many peoples. Scenes illustrated are: Adam and Eve—The Egyptians—The Greeks—Romans—Sixteenth Century—Modern Use.

"Two Heroes"

Drama. Approx. Length, 564 Feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 9, 1909.

This story is very beautifully rendered. The characters are well represented and the subject teems with intense interest.

The daughter of a noble earl is in love with a young man of the town, but because he does not occupy an exalted position in the army he is objectionable to the earl. This causes the brave young fellow to enlist and seek the requisite honors. In the meantime another suiter appears and has what meets the parental requirements, but is refused by the young lady. Her heart beats only for the one, and because she cannot have the man of her choice she enters a monastery.

Several years later the soldier returns and visits the monastery, but the lady renounces him and is faithful to her vows. Later the war breaks out and after a battle the young lady in the discharge of her duties as a nurse of mercy visits the battle field where she finds her lover wounded. As the two endeavor to pick their way from the scene of battle a shower of shot from the enemy's camp brings both down and they lie clasped in each other's arms, heroes in a noble cause.

"The Race Course"

Sporting. Approx. Length, 436 Feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 9, 1909.

This series of views was secured at Saurakarta, a city of the Dutch East Indies, capital of a province having a population of about 110,000 inhabitants. It is the residence of one of the Rajahs, which Holland still maintains, nominally at least, at the head of the population of the Isle of Java.

These views are very interesting and curious, especially the oxen race, a spectacle never before witnessed by the American public.

The order of views: The Official Grandstand—The Arrival of the Rajah—The Race Course—The Obstacle Race—The Race of the Oxen—The Winners.

Moving Pictures by Tele-Photography.

Supposing a moving picture photographer found himself on the top of the Metropolitan Life Tower in New York City, and wanted to get a photograph of the ships coming up the bay. Or supposing there was a street scene or a procession, let us say one-quarter or one-half a mile from his camera. With the ordinary lens and the camera that he uses, the picture of the ships or men would be so small that they would be practically useless for enlarging on the screen. To put it in another way, the ordinary lens and camera are useless for taking photographs at great distances.

Tele-photography, as applied to stationary work, means such a modification or adaptation of the lens that it will enable enlarged views of distant objects to be made in a camera of practically the ordinary size or very little larger. In other words, what the photographer does is to place at the back of his lens another lens which magnifies the original image. In stationary work it is comparatively easy to photograph objects at ten or twenty miles distance from the camera, provided there are no intervening obstacles and the atmosphere is quite clear—a necessary essential to success in tele-photographic work. We, ourselves, have photographed by tele-photography hills, etc., distant ten miles from the camera.

Now, is tele-photography practicable in moving picture work? We think it is, although, of course, it is accompanied by some drawbacks. These, however, are not fatal. The first of them is the fact that the combination lens system works at a comparatively small aperture, say F 10, which is, roughly speaking, four times slower than an ordinary lens. In other words, the picture would require four times the exposure. Then, again, there is the difficulty of getting a perfectly clear atmosphere. Again, the camera would have to be specially adapted for the purpose, and so would the lens. But none of these difficulties are insuperable. They can all be overcome. Therefore we raise this matter in the interest of manufacturers and others with the promise that if it arouses sufficient interest, we will deal with it in greater detail on another occasion.

The advantages of tele-photography, or the photography of moving objects situated at a great distance from the camera, are obvious. You can get distant views and scenes of an enlarged size. In the photography of animals, too, it is desirable to get as far away from them as possible. So to have objects comparatively near, you can get an enlarged picture of them, from the same standpoint as will give you a comparatively small picture. Let us illustrate what we mean by a concrete example. Last week we were examining at a New York theater an interesting picture of a ball game. This was a very good photograph of its kind, but even as it appeared on the screen the figures in the game were not nearly so large as they should have been, and it was, therefore, not easy to follow the course of the play. The effect upon our minds was that of witnessing the game a-far off.

Now, by tele-photography, that is by producing a larger image of the game from the same standpoint as the small picture, you would limit the angle of the field, that is, show less of it, but you would get larger pictures of the players, and so they would appear larger on the screen. Had that been done in this case we should have had the sensation of looking upon the real thing, instead of a very small rendering of it.

We trust that we have said sufficient in this short article to set the minds of moving picture makers at work. Tele-photographic moving picture making offers a very large field, which, so far, has been very lightly touched upon. But it will be seen that it offers unlimited possibilities for producing very interesting work. All that is required, of course, is sufficient intelligence on the part of the camera user to insure the co-operation of lens makers and camera makers.

Fire Insurance and Moving Picture Theatres.

We pointed out last week that the State of Pennsylvania has passed a law enforcing the use of asbestos made booths for projecting machines. Massachusetts has adopted a similar law. It is evident that throughout the country there is a disposition on the part of the authorities to exact rigorous conditions in respect to the safety of moving picture theaters, and, above all, the people who patronize those places. We may expect all the States to be increasingly particular in the matter. The whole question of the handling of moving picture films was dealt with some time ago by Edward O. Torbolm, inspector of the Home Insurance Company of New York, in a lengthy paper which he contributed to our contemporary, Insurance Engineering. He epitomized that paper into a series of recommendations applicable to manufacturers, exchanges, moving picture theaters and theater owners. We think it a good opportunity to reproduce those recommendations for the information and guidance of all concerned:

Division 1. The equipment of film picture manufacturers may be accepted for insurance (under similar conditions) with the same freedom as would be ordinary dry plate photographers; provided, (1) there be no theatrical hazard present; (2) the quantity of celluloid film and handling of same do not transcend the limits of ordinary prudence; (3) negative film be very carefully stored in metal boxes placed in non-combustible closets or in steel safes. The value of a negative film is undoubtedly the cost of the production of the play it portrays and may be a very considerable amount.

Division 2. Film exchanges should conform to the following requirements:

Tight wooden closets lined with lock-jointed tin over asbestos should be provided for all film in reels (not already enclosed in heavy metal boxes) in excess of, say 10,000 feet. The amount stored in each closet should be limited to 50,000 feet; and if more than one closet is required, a space of at least 15 feet should intervene between closets. Storage of film in special steel safes, or in properly insulated steel document safes, will, in the long run, prove more efficient and more economical. Where the total amount of film does not exceed 30,000 feet, the same may be stored in ordinary wooden closets, if first enclosed in solderless metal boxes.

Projecting machines should be operated under the same safety requirements as are those in moving picture shows. The booth may very properly be excepted.

Sand and water in pails should be installed and one or more reliable chemical extinguishers provided as well.

Rubbish should be kept only in standard metal cans, for daily removal; and only approved heating and electric lighting (incandescent or enclosed arcs) permitted.

Smoking should be absolutely prohibited.

Division 3. Moving picture shows may be considered of relatively low hazard provided the equipment is in conformity with the requirements of the National Board of Fire Underwriters.

One or more chemical extinguishers should be insisted upon (close to the operating booth); and rubbish, heating and lighting have the same treatment as recommended for film renters.

Smoking in or about the machine or film store room, if not elsewhere, should be prohibited at all times and not merely while pictures are being shown.

Non-heating rheostats should be used in preference to the usual rheostats which not infrequently become red hot.

The matter of proper and sufficient exits in places of amusement is not usually considered seriously by the fire insurance inspector, but it has a direct bearing upon the business nevertheless. Since the first duty of the fire department is to save life, a building faulty in its exits may suffer undue exposure to fire while the firemen devote their attention to the human element.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

CHAPTER XII.

Photographing Outdoor Subjects (Concluded).

The sun is an outdoor subject. Some years ago when this orb was undergoing an eclipse moving pictures were taken showing the various phases. Of course the immense size of the sun's disc allowed this being done and a reasonable size image obtained. Most of the other heavenly bodies are, comparatively speaking, far too small. Perhaps this chapter is best devoted to a recapitulation of the principal uses, not previously touched upon, to which the moving picture camera can be put in the more serious affairs of life. There are, for example, naval and military operations, the launching of war ships and the like.

Moreover, the moving picture has been recommended as a sort of educational agency in the training of naval and military recruits. Its uses in educating the eye in the precise way in which tactical movements are carried out are obvious. But let us glance at the use of the camera in horticulture and agriculture. You can trace, as has been pointed out, the life of an insect by the moving picture camera: its evolution from the egg and the evil activities of its life in damaging crops. Such knowledge as this is of distinct value to the farmer. In purely botanical work, too, the moving picture camera steps in. It can show a germinating seed at intervals until the seed's leaves appear, the swelling of the earth, the shedding of the seed coat, the emergence of the seed leaves, and, finally, the full leaves themselves can be illustrated. In fact, plant growth from stage to stage can be photographed by means of the moving picture camera and illustrated on the screen.

So it will be seen that the moving picture camera can be pressed into the recording of practically every branch of outdoor life as it is lived to-day. In America the value of the instrument as a recording agent has not been so fully realized as I think it might be. Unless, of course, I am imperfectly informed. I will illustrate what I mean. In England there is a public-spirited man of wealth and position, Sir John Benjamin Stone, who has devoted much time and money toward seeking photographs of current events of importance during his life, and, above all, moving picture records of innumerable quaint old English customs, habits, observances, costumes, pageants, ceremonies and the like. Everything, in fact, which illustrates the special characteristics of English national life of to-day. Now, what do you think he has done with these photographs and films? He has deposited them in the British Museum, which is one of the greatest reference libraries and archives, for the information of those who, at a future date, may desire to consult them. They are practically imperishable records, and they tell history with an accuracy that only photography possesses.

My readers can, of course, appreciate the value of all this if I draw a few suppositions. Supposing patriotic Americans could see authenticated moving pictures of George Washington at the various stages of his career, or Andrew Jackson, or Abraham Lincoln, and various incidents of the Civil War, for example; indeed, any of the chief events in the creation of the United States as an independent nation and its developments during the one hundred and thirty-odd years of its existence; would they not be eagerly scanned by students? Assuredly. Then we should get illustrated history first hand, instead of having to rely chiefly upon the imagination of contemporary eye-witnesses.

Possibly some depository in this country exists for pictures of this nature—maybe at Washington, I don't know; at any rate, I think the suggestion is worth making in connection with the idea of using the moving picture camera outdoors. It is a matter that might well be taken in hand by the various States; more especially as there is an evident disposition to use the moving picture camera for educational purposes. Even as I am writing this article, I notice a reference in the press to a meeting which was held this week at which the moving picture, for educational purposes, was brought to the notice of a large gathering of teachers and scholars.

In concluding this section of the subject, I would like to say that I know of a large number of users of moving picture cameras who are employing them outdoors this season of the year for scientific, industrial and illustrative purposes, as well as for the preparation of lectures. I feel, however, that this branch of work is only in its infancy in this country, and therefore I thought it well to devote so much space to it.

Finally, there is another phase of the matter which occurs to me, and that is the use of the moving picture camera by the amateur pure and simple. Attempts were made some years ago to popularize small and portable forms of moving picture cameras carrying relatively short lengths of film—say 100 or 200 feet or so, the pictures being only one-half an inch along the base line. These were made for amateur use. Developing and printing outfits were supplied so that the amateur photographer, in the quietude of his own home, could have an exhibition of moving pictures prepared by himself for the edification of his home circle. This is a branch of the work which does not seem to have been cultivated in the United States, but the field is open, and, I think, money is to be made out of it. The Biokam and the Birtac were the types of portable moving picture cameras especially constructed for amateur use. Neither, however, was put upon the market with any great spirit, and they appeared moreover at a time when the moving picture itself was in its very early stages. Now, however, with its renaissance and consequent growth of the moving picture in public favor, there seems to be scope for the introduction in this country of portable cameras of the type I have in mind. They need not, in fact, be much larger than many hand cameras which are in use to-day.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER VI METERS.

When on the road one must frequently hitch up on wires controlled by a meter. Let me caution you that you must in all cases ascertain positively that the meter is large enough to carry your projection current plus whatever else it must take care of or it will burn out. If too small, arrange with the light company to allow you to hitch on ahead of the meter and pay a flat rate for the current used.

RESISTANCE DEVICES.

Resistance is perhaps the one most important thing to the operator, and many have been the heated arguments as to the relative merits of various types of machine made for this purpose. Generally speaking, resistance devices may be divided into four classes, viz.: rheostats, transformers, choke coils and arc rectifiers.

The rheostat is the oldest form of projection resistance, and for direct current is the only one available. Resistance is necessary from the fact that the carbons of a projection arc lamp form a dead short circuit when brought together. Means must therefore be provided to allow of but a certain limited quantity of current passing through the short thus made or the wires would burn up instantly were it not for the fuses, since the lamp would take far more current than the fuses and wires would carry. In fact, could such a condition be maintained, the only limit to current flow would be the capacity of the dynamo feeding the system. To prevent this, resistance is inserted in the circuit, and we will first consider that form known as the rheostat. Different metals possess different degrees of conductivity (current-carrying power), copper wire being the best of any metal commercially available. That is to say, a copper wire of a given size will carry a larger amount of current without heating than a wire made from any other metal combining the toughness and ductility necessary and at the same time not too costly. On the other hand, an alloy of certain other metals possesses high resistance to current, and wire made from this alloy is used in rheostats. The resistance device is to the electric circuit exactly what the valve is to the water pipe. If you wish to get a certain quantity of water from a water pipe you don't take the cap off its end—you install a valve and open it just enough to let through the desired quantity. If you wish a certain quantity of current—say forty amperes—from a wire charged at 110 volts, you cut the wire and connect in a certain length of resistance wire calculated to allow 40 amperes to pass at a pressure of 110 volts. If the pressure were suddenly raised to 220 instead of 110 volts, you would have to insert more resistance wire or you would get more current and your resistance would heat unduly. The more resistance wire of a given size you insert in a circuit at a given pressure the less current you will get, and the less resistance the more current will go through. The higher the voltage the more resistance you must have to get a given number of amperes. The rheostat is nothing more nor less than a case carrying a certain number of feet of resistance wire wound into coils to save space and mounted on insulators. Some are so arranged that a part of the coils can be cut out or cut in by moving a lever or changing a connection. In the non-adjustable rheostats there are two binding posts, one being attached to the end of the first coil and the other to the end of the last coil, the current thus being obliged to pass through the entire length of all coils in the machine. Now, if a binding post be attached to the end of the fourth coil of a rheostat containing six coils and one of the wires be attached to that post instead of the one at the end of the sixth coil, two of the coils would be "cut out," thus decreasing the resistance by one-third and correspondingly increasing the resultant current. When you see a rheostat with more than two binding posts, it is that kind of an arrangement exactly. One post is always a "permanent" and one wire must always be attached to it, but you vary the amount of current according to which post you attach the other wire. The adjustable rheostats, which have a sliding lever, amount to the same thing, each contact being in effect the same as a separate binding post as above described. The coils of rheostats are connected with each other, as shown in A, Fig. 16. Taking A, Fig. 16, as an example: 1 is the permanent binding post to which one wire is always attached. 2 is the binding post at the other end, 3, 4 and 5 being intermediate posts and A and B the wires. Now, if you attach to binding posts 1 and 2, you, of course, will see that the current must pass through the entire resistance, and you will thus be cutting down your current all you can with that machine. If, however, you were to attach a wire to binding post 3, connecting it with wire B, with a switch at X, you would "cut out" half of one coil when the switch was closed, since the current seeks the line of least resistance. If you attach in the same manner to binding post 4, with a switch at X, you cut out two whole coils when the switch is closed, but cut them in again (compel the current to pass through them), when it is again opened. If you attach in the same way to binding post 5 with a switch at X, you would cut out three coils when the switch is closed. I have sketched this out to show you that you may connect your wire anywhere, even in the center of a coil and cut in or out as much resistance as you desire; also to show you the principle on which the adjustable rheostats operate. B, Fig. 16, shows a type of rheostat often encountered. In this sketch we are looking down at the top ends of the coils. You will observe that the two rows of coils are connected at one end but not at the other, binding posts being placed at 1, 2 and 3. Now, if you connect your wires at 1 and 2, it will readily be seen that the coils are all placed in series and the current must pass through them all. If connection is made at 1 and 3, you will be using just half the machine, the other half being idle. If you connect at 1 and 3 and then connect binding posts 1 and 2 together with a piece of copper wire (jumper it is called) as per the dotted line, you will have placed two halves of the rheostat in multiple and will get approximately twice the amount of current you would get by the first-named connection, in which all coils were in series.

Right here let me explain the terms "series" and "multiple." This is something which confuses many, but which is, in reality, very simple. Series, as applied to rheostats, means that all current which reaches the lamp must first pass through all the resistance in two or more rheostats one after the other, Fig. 17.

I think this is simple and plain enough to require no further explanation, except to say that adding rheostats in series reduces the current. Multiple puzzles many, however, and I will explain it fully.

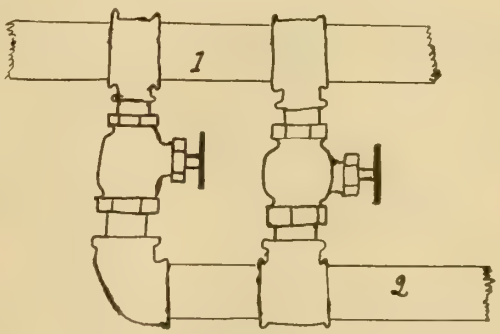

FIG 18

Fig. 18 is a diagram of two water pipes connected together with two valves, and the effect is precisely the same as connecting rheostats in multiple (Fig. 19). By opening both valves you get just double the quantity of water through into pipe No. 2 that you would with only one valve open, just as you get additional current to the capacity of each rheostat added to multiple. I think a little study of Figs. 17, 18 and 19 will make this matter clear to you. It certainly ought to.

Some rheostats are composed of a number of separate "cells," each cell being in itself a complete rheostat. They are really two or more complete rheostats enclosed in one case. One of the best known of this type is the "Chicago Stage Lighting Rheostat." This type of machine is quite flexible, as the cells may, by means of "jumpers," be connected in any desired manner, both series and multiple, or each cell may be used separately.

The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theaters.

By Wm. I. Sackheim.

CHAPTER III.

The beginner should supply himself with a red or black sable pointed lettering brush; a No. 5 or No. 7 will do. This brush works to a point or can be used flat. It is principally used for outline work or for small lettering and is not used to any great extent in making moving picture signs, but I advise its use for practice work, as it will enable you to master the strokes of the alphabet.

Elementary Strokes.

Fig. 1 gives you an idea of the strokes, which should be practiced daily until you can make the brush do your bidding. The arrow shows the direction of the stroke. The lines, whether perpendicular, horizontal, oblique or curved, must be of uniform thickness. The learner will find a little difficulty at first in manipulating the long-haired brush, but with a little practice will gain the desired control over it. Hold the brush lightly in an almost upright position, as in Fig. 2, resting the third and small finger and the palm very lightly on the paper. Do not hold the hand stiffly, but make the strokes with the movement of the forearm and not the fingers. Practice the exercise without dipping the brush in paint, at first. After you have mastered the method of holding the brush and the movement of the arm necessary in the making of the strokes with a dry brush, you are ready for real practice.

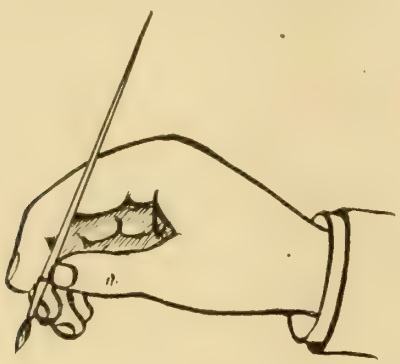

Fig. 1.

How to Mix the Paint.

Secure a pound can of coach black and some turpentine. Take a portion of the paint, which will be too thick for use in its natural state, place in a cup or glass, and add turpentine, a little at a time, continually stirring with a stick until it is of the proper consistency for work. If too thin add more paint. A little experience will enable you to judge correctly the amount of turpentine to be used.

Now take a sheet of manila or white wrapping paper of any desired size and fasten it to your table, with thumb or carpet tacks. Rule lines across the sheet with a piece of charcoal or a lead pencil about 1½ inches apart. Dip the brush in the paint and practice the strokes in Fig. 1. As the letters of the alphabet and the numerals are merely different combinations of these elementary lines, it will readily be understood how important they are.

No matter how far you may advance in lettering a half hour's practice of Fig. 1 will prove beneficial.

One thing I must caution you about. Don't try to make letters or attempt to paint a sign until you have mastered the elementary strokes.

After you have finished the exercise for the day always cleanse your brush thoroughly in turpentine, then rub a little vaseline into the hair of the brush, gently smoothing it with your fingers. This prevents the brush from becoming stiff, and is ready for use when required.

Speed.

Try to make your lines as rapidly as possible in continuous and uniform strokes. Pressing very lightly on the brush, so that the point only glides along the paper, you will be surprised what can be accomplished with confidence, and as rapidity is very essential in making moving-picture signs it is needless to be too careful.

Do not be dismayed if your first attempt seems crude and amateurish. You can only acquire perfection by tireless efforts.

If your lines are ragged and uneven do not be disheartened. Compare your work with the diagrams illustrating these articles and try to equal them, and, above all, practice diligently each day.

SAME OLD STORY.

The Bioscope (London) publishes the following two paragraphs. Goodfellow and Ingram, we are anxious to welcome your "processes" with all the honors they deserve—when you produce the results.

Motion Pictures in Natural Color.

W. H. Goodfellow, president of the newly-organized American Motion Picture Company, has invented a process by which motion pictures in colors will be produced. Mr. Goodfellow says that he can reproduce objects in all their natural colors and shades, and that his invention will completely revolutionize the exhibition of moving pictures. He expects to market the first pictures in about a month. The American Motion Picture Company is a local concern, backed by large capital and independent of the Trust. The independence has been obtained by securing the patent rights of an invention by which the films are moved without sprockets, but by a tight belt method. The motion picture trust controls the sprocket method. The company has also secured the American rights of Lumiere's non-inflammable films.

Natural Color Films.

Mr. Lewis Ingram, of the "Illustrated London News," is interested in the formation of a limited company to place on the market self-colored films obtained by a newly-discovered process which materially differs from those already introduced. The inventor has, it appears, for many years been engaged in the reproduction of "still life" from art photography, and has erected a spacious experimental studio "up the river." By means of the most recent process a single negative film put in contact with a special positive film in a special projector obtained a full and faithful reproduction of the colors of nature. The natural complexion of the human model, for instance, can be shown with absolute fidelity, but where the model resorts to pigmentary preparations to enhance her natural charms the camera reproduces these toilet accessories in a manner not altogether pleasing to the original.

A GOOD IDEA.

Another Film Renters' Protective Association has been formed—this time in Chicago. Let us hope that its sphere of usefulness will be broader and its existence more harmonious than any of its predecessors. As we go to press we have only the names of the large Chicago independent renters as associated with the movement. No doubt it is intended to make the association national in scope. Conducted on broad lines, inviting a full attendance of manufacturers, renters and leading exhibitors, a national conference would be a great benefit to the trade at present.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

I see quite a discussion is on in The Moving Picture World relative to the first use of illustrated song slides in this country. A claim is made that one Myer Cohen first used them some twenty years ago in San Francisco. This claim will hardly hold water as, unless my memory is grossly at fault, and I do not think it is, Mr. Cohen got his tip from Mr. Thomas, the present official operator for the Board of Censors of New York. If Mr. Thomas can be induced to write or speak on the subject I think he will be able to do away with much of the discussion. As my recollection serves me, Mr. Thomas and a singer who was in search of a novelty worked upon and perfected the first illustrated song as it is known to-day. It was originated in Brooklyn, and Minnie Schultz, a popular singer at the time in a well known casino in Harlem, made it her stock in trade for many weeks. Myer Cohen, I am sure, fell into line after Minnie Schultz. So many years have elapsed since that time that I will venture positive statements. The subject is an intensely interesting one, and I would like to hear what Mr. Thomas has to say concerning it. The venerable Harry Sanderson, for so many years manager for the late Tony Pastor, claims he originated the illustrated song in conjunction with the departed manager. I believe Mr. Sanderson is right to an extent. His claim does not hold good, however, as an originator of illustrated songs as such. I well remember during the period Mr. Sanderson speaks of slides of a patriotic verse run in during the singing of "My Country 'Tis of Thee," etc., but the words were not made for the slides, nor were the slides made for the words. The slides in those days were introduced as appropriate incidentals, and not as a prearranged part of the song. I can distinctly remember attending performances at the Pastor houses when they were located on Broadway and the Bowery, and can recall many of the acts and performers, but cannot recall illustrated songs as they are now known. I have seen patriotic slides run when certain parts of patriotic songs were being sung, but they were merely incidental and partook no more of the illustrated song slide character than a portrait of Roosevelt would to-day if flashed during the chorus of "Teddy on the Hunt." The illustrated song act of to-day bears the same relation to the old-time stereopticon business in the musical line as the moving pictures do to the forgotten panorama. The newer styles and methods partake of an originality the older ones did not have, and by this I mean a distinct originality, even if this originality is confined to special posings for slides to be used for particular songs. In this respect Myer Cohen's use of slides antedates the claims of Mr. Sanderson, and I believe Mr. Thomas distances both.

Well, although the daily press has devoted columns to the enlightenment of the public as to how Mayor McClellan and Police Commissioner Bingham proposed to clean up Coney Island and stop the picture shows, nothing has been hatched. Last Sunday was a big day at the Island and everything was wide open. Nothing remains of the heralded crusade but an intimation that existing show licenses will be renewed only for six days of the week and applicants must sign an agreement not to open the shows on Sundays. This looks serious for the Island exhibitors, but it is hardly as serious as it looks. As some of the licenses will expire during the latter part of this month we will not have long to wait and find out whether the latest report is based upon official information or only idle talk. In all the bluster that has been made thus far only one moving picture exhibitor on the Island has been molested, and he was discharged by the magistrate in time to partake of last Sunday's harvest.

It is reported that the New York Exhibitors' Association propose inaugurating a plan by which the signatures of all adults in favor of moving picture shows on Sunday and other days may be secured. The idea is a good one. The working people would be almost a unit on such a proposition. It should have been put in operation long ago to give the general public some idea of the vast popularity the pictures have gained. If petitions amount to anything the Sunday closing bugaboo would soon meet a deserved death. It is feared, though, that the Exhibitors' Association has not enough animation at the present time to give the movement the proper impetus. It is said the active membership has dwindled to less than half a hundred. What is the matter? Are false theories at play? If the idea is that nothing can be done during the Summer months, and an organization is ineffective when the regular season is not on, it is a mistaken one. Now is the time that plans should be made for the securing of rights and protection when they are most needed. Every dollar put into the treasury will form a purse for the time when it will be required and not make heavy assessments when it is time to act. "In time of peace prepare for war." If the agitations from which the exhibitors have suffered die out by the time the next Fall and Winter season opens then the funds laid by for mutual protection can be devoted to some other good cause. The time and money spent in holding together will not be wasted. The film manufacturers and the moving picture machine operators have not deserted their organizations "because Summer is coming on." In the face of this and many other convincing circumstances it seems strange that the spirit of organization among the exhibitors should slacken to the extent it has. Graft, persecution, injustice and discrimination have been constantly complained of, and in no way can they be guarded and fought against excepting by joint conference and united action, and even with such action they cannot be successfully coped with within any limited time. Temporary movements bring only temporary relief. Permanent organizations with well defined policies and an intelligent, determined force behind them make the mark. It is hoped, for their own welfare, the exhibitors will start in anew.

The following was received this week:

"If I pay an operator $21 a week and I am obliged to close on Sunday should I pay him more than $18 for the six days? I have a good man, but when I paid him $21 for working seven days I don't think he should ask more than $18 for working six days—$3 a day."

Unfortunately this department is not conducted as a board of arbitration. The question lies solely between the exhibitor and the operator. If the latter is a union man and the exhibitor an association member there would be little difficulty in bringing about an amicable adjustment of the matter by having it arbitrated by representatives of both organizations. This is another argument in favor of the exhibitors maintaining a good organization. The question raised is only one of dozens of like character that arise every day. Where the affairs are decided solely by the employer and employee the former frequently loses a man who is cheap at almost any price and the latter loses a job that is not picked up very often.

A conversation was overheard the other day on a similar subject. It was to the effect that the anti-Sunday exhibitions movement has the heartiest support of employees in that line of work. Originally the regular performers and house employees agitated the movement and gradually the motion picture machine operators have fallen into line. It is claimed that six days comprise a week's work and double pay should be allowed those willing to work on Sundays, or substitutes should be provided for that day. A manager who also overheard the remarks said they constituted an old story; that the agitation had been going on for a long time and he felt it was responsible for much of the anti-Sunday crusade. He also stated he believed one of the objects was to provide, in the form of substitutes, employment for the great surplus of labor in the field, and predicted that eventually two men will be engaged to do the work now done by one. In such an event, he said, the surplus labor would be taken care of, but a reduction of wages would probably be made so as to increase the pay roll little above what it was when one man did the work.

A well-known operator said that the anti-Sunday agitation did not come from the operators. All of them would rather work six days than seven. The seventh day is not the main source of complaint. The operators claim it is too much to require one man to work all afternoon and until late at night, with only the supper hour as a breathing spell. Before the municipal authorities became so strict in regard to prohibiting all men except those holding a license from touching a machine a man with a long run stood a chance of getting relieved occasionally, and sometimes getting a leave of absence. Under existing conditions the majority of operators have a hard time and this has caused many of them to express the hope that Sunday shows would be cut out, but they had not encouraged such a movement as a factor. "The main trouble is," said the operator, "there are so many picture shows that very few of them make enough money to justify them in hiring two licensed operators. Where two men are working you do not hear any complaint on the part of either the management or the operators. The operators are not in favor of Sunday closings with the unanimity some people say they are, because they know that without Sunday shows many places will either close or be run on a cheaper scale than ever."

THE ESSANAY COMPANY'S NEW PLANT.

Enterprising Chicago Motion Picture Firm Moves Into Its New Quarters.

The manufacturers are erecting plants of colossal proportions in order to supply the demand for more and better quality films.

The Essanay Company, of Chicago, is moving into its new quarters this week. Covering several acres of ground, the buildings, within and without, models of beautiful architecture, the new plant is a fitting home for this enterprising motion picture firm. The writer recently enjoyed a visit to the new plant. The genial president of the company, George K. Spoor, first showed him through the company's handsomely furnished offices. They are models of neatness and system.

We next went into the studio. Here we found G. M. Anderson, youngest and one of the most prominent men engaged in America to-day in the manufacturing of motion pictures. "Andy," as he is familiarly known by the trade, was overseeing the work of a dozen or more carpenters who were engaged in swinging into place large framework for the overhead lights.

"We are going to have the most up-to-date stage equipment in the country," Mr. Spoor said. "We have facilities here for staging the most stupendous productions. We have more than doubled our lighting systems, and I feel safe in making the assertion that future Essanay productions will be fully equal to the output of other manufacturers either at home or abroad."

Immediately to the south of this excellent indoor stage and studio is a daylight studio. This will be utilized at all times when the weather is suitable for outdoor work.

Taken all together, both the indoor and outdoor studios are the marvel of perfection. Every up-to-date appliance to minimize time and trouble, and to assure the best results, has been installed.

Adjoining the indoor studio is the carpenter shop and paint frame. Skilled artists were busy on the bridges above. Two or three stage carpenters were building a padded cell for a scene from a story soon to be released, "The Curse of Cocaine." It was not the usual painted upholstery, but the real thing. Indeed, the solidness of the construction of scenic effects, the care and watchfulness of detail, would surprise one who has not been "behind the scenes."

The property room is handily adjacent. We find here, if one is permitted to use the old phrase, everything "from a needle to a haystack." Here is material for any sort of a scene from a drawing room in a Fifth avenue mansion to a corner in a boiler factory.

We went next to inspect the photographic department. The spotless cleanliness of these workrooms, so indispensable to the art, was prevalent. In the dimly-lighted developing rooms a dozen or more white gowned young ladies were busy putting the thousands of feet of celluloid strips through the various baths, or chemical processes, necessary in the developing of the films. The washing and drying departments, capable of handling 20,000 feet of film an hour, we found more inviting. The process here is a simple but delicate one.

The Essanay Company, indeed, is to be congratulated. Its facilities for turning out more and better films will insure the retention of the name an approving public has given it, as the one "House of Comedy Hits."

THEATRES NOW INSTALL BOX BALL.

Novel Bowling Game That Proves Winner with Many Moving Pictures Shows.

Moving picture men have often found difficulty in securing certain locations because of the constant piano playing. But now the problem has been solved by some of the more clever exhibitors leasing not only the particular room they want but also the store next door or the flat upstairs and putting in Box Ball alleys.

These alleys are very much like the regular bowling alley, but they use much lighter balls, so both women and children can play. They also have a lever arrangement for setting the pins and avoiding the annoying delay for the pin boy to do his work. The alleys are elevated from the floor, so there is less strain on the muscles than in the old-fashioned bowling.

One of the most attractive features of the game from the exhibitor's point of view is the elimination of expense. The players set their own pins with the lever and the balls are automatically returned, so no pin boy need be employed. One attendant can easily collect the money and manage as many as ten alleys.

Some theatres have adopted the plan of giving free tickets to the crowds before they go out of the theatre. These tickets are good for the first game and almost every one who gets a ticket plays at least one game. Many become so fascinated that they return almost every night and play for several hours, as the game provides both exercise and delightful entertainment.

The success of those who have tried this plan is fast leading others to adopt the same idea and before long we may expect to find that most of our nickelodeons are equipped to provide amusement in this same line. It will also prove a solution in many cases where locations cannot be had without taking the second floor or the space next door in addition to their theatre.

Summer parks will no doubt be the largest field for this game during the next few months, but by the time the parks have been closed many five-cent theatres will have installed these new alleys and be ready for the business next season with a double-barreled gun instead of the old single-shot arrangement of the past. With this new double equipment it is only reasonable to suppose that the profits of these exhibitors will be more than double.

Many have already begun their installation for next season, and those who will exhibit at the summer parks are now at work preparing for the harvest of the present season.

For further suggestions for making these additional profits address American Box Ball Co., 1800 Van Buren street, Indianapolis, Ind., who will gladly co-operate with any one interested.

LAEMMLE BECOMES A MANUFACTURER.

"He foreshadowed to us several plans which we are not at liberty to mention, which, when they are made public, will cause as much surprise as his recent public announcements. Moreover, they make, in our opinion, for his own success and the betterment of the moving picture."

This is a quotation from an interview we had with Carl Laemmle, which we published in the "Moving Picture World" of May 22d. The gist of that interview was ridiculed by the ignorant, but they are to be pitied rather than censured, for they do not know what we know. And what we know appears in the Laemmle advertisement in the outer pages of this week's issue of the "Moving Picture World."

Lammle, in fact, is to enter the manufacturing field, and he is to set about the business in the best possible manner—that is, a business-like one. He will have the best equipped plant and the best available talent for working it. He will also produce American pieces by American writers. Moreover, he will personally supervise the production of the pictures. We said on May 22d that Carl Laemmle had an alert mind. The evidence of that alertness is before us. Moreover, he will be alert enough not to use any camera against which the claim of infringement can be made.

Laemmle will leave for Europe in a few days, and he will return, we believe, laden with a vast amount of information as to the best European methods of moving picture making to be availed of in his Chicago plant. There is always room at the top, and Laemmle has only to produce high-class American subjects to be assured of success.

By the way, the music house of Laemmle now has a New York branch at No. 1416 Broadway.

Laemmle's advertisements are always stimulating reading. The one we are printing this week well sustains the reputation of the series.

THE PATENT COMPANY'S THREATS.

By J. J. Murdock.

The action of the Motion Picture Patents Company in sending circular letters to exhibitors, threatening them with suit, is not looked upon seriously by J. J. Murdock, president of the International Projecting and Producing Company, who is in New York at the present time. Mr. Murdock says:

"It would appear to me that by this time moving picture people would be accustomed to these tactics. The only people it can scare are the newcomers into the field who are not familiar with the past history of the moving picture business.

"The fact of the matter is that there was a stormy meeting of the Trust several weeks ago, I am told. Several of the manufacturers threatened to withdraw unless something was done. The 'terrible silence' which was described by one of their organs recently did not seem to appeal to them. Exhibitors who were paying the $2.00 a week were kicking. They wanted to know what they were paying it for. Exchanges who were compelled to pay the $2.00 a week for their exhibitors were also howling mournfully, and in sheer desperation they were compelled to do something. If they can still the growls of discontent amongst their own ranks by starting a few suits, I would not be surprised to see them filed. It only costs a few dollars to start a suit and they even spend eight or ten of the $2.00 licenses they have collected.

"The press department of the Trust must earn its salary and it does so by sending out these monthly bulletins. It will be noted that the circular is dated May 12, but was only sent out a few days ago. The press agent had better watch out, as he nearly made the error of not sending them out at all. First the exhibitor was ominously told that he must sign by February 10th; then this was extended to the 20th; then to the 30th; then again and again. The sucker's money not coming in fast enough, a few framed-up suits were commenced with much blowing of trumpets. The result, however, was disastrous for the press, as the only thing they could do was to secure possession of some of their own duped goods. What has become of all the noise and hurrah started some time since in this direction?

"There is one thing certain and that is that the Trust will not dare interfere with International Projecting and Producing Company films. As to their action in regard to other films we can not say and have no interest, but we will undertake to defend an attempt to interfere with our own goods.

"The entire matter is too much of a burlesque to consider seriously. A number of manufacturers have recently entered the field who have no affiliation or connection with us and they will have to speak for themselves and protect themselves.

"Summer is coming on with the natural drop in business and, naturally, the Trust will attempt to force as many $2.00 fees into its coffers as it can. It needs the money.

"The notice is simply the regular press bulletin. We must give the Trust credit for the unique manner in which its bulletins are circulated. First came its own dictums, which fell flat; then the advice of the subsidized press, which was not accepted, and, now, they resort to a new method of circular letters, vaguely insinuating and threatening upon the letter head of a firm of attorneys. It's the same old bugaboo in a different form."

CHICAGO NOTES.

By F. H. Richardson.

The Viascope Company has a camera and projecting machine of their own invention and make for the taking and projection of film without perforation. The President of the company, Mr. Pink, showed to the writer samples of film made with the camera. I have also examined the projection machine, which is the Viascope with a feed mechanism adapted to non-perforated film. The film samples appear to be perfect and the projection mechanism looks practical, but so far it is all "looks" and "talk," which really don't count for so very much after all. Mr. Pink admits that the operator would have to give the machine very close attention while it was running or the picture would get out of frame.

Exhibitors showing independent film are comparatively few and far between. The report is, however, that the independent exchanges get a great deal (all they want, some say) of licensed film. If this is true (and the writer has the statement from persons who certainly are in position to know whereof they speak) it places the independent exchanges in position to take their pick from both markets—a very decided advantage.

There are some exhibitors who have discovered a fine, large, juicy lemon tree in Chicago and have partaken liberally of its fruit. Sixty-third street looked good to them and five houses sprang into existence on that thoroughfare, between Wentworth and Halsted streets, in as many months. Two have given up the ghost and the others would like to let go if only they knew how. Just another case of loading up a one house location with five times its capacity. The fool and his money are soon in the divorce court.

The writer has read with much interest, in the Motion Picture World, of the situation in LITTLE OLD NEW YORK. Here is Chicago we at least have a definite law governing motion picture theaters, our main trouble being the facility with which "fool" laws are put through the Council. For a time the motion picture theater owner was literally between the Devil and the deep sea, not knowing what to expect next. Things seem to have settled down somewhat, however, and he now believes he knows fairly well where he is at. Of course there is always the liability of some idiotic law being passed, adding fresh and unnecessary burdens, but this is scarcely an eminent danger now.

On the whole, however, there has not been so very much to complain of. Our authorities have been much more reasonable than have those of New York. The ordinances governing the operating room contain some rather foolish provisions, yet, on the whole, they are not so bad. As a matter-of-fact it would be to the ultimate good of both operators and owners if the inspections were made more rigid. At present inspections are made on a schedule which might be termed "semi-occasional," and when they are made the observation of the writer is that they don't amount to much from the practical point of view.

This is not altogether the fault of the department or its inspectors. The Electrical Department makes the inspection and it is handicapped by lack of sufficient men to properly perform its work. The inspectors themselves are perfectly competent electricians, but to intelligently inspect an operating room one must be an electrician and a PRACTICAL OPERATOR as well.

The electrician inspector will kick on something the operator knows does not amount to a row of bent pins, and not even look at another thing which the practical operator well knows is dangerous. This gives the operator a contempt for the whole proceeding. Yet the inspector has been honest enough. He has meant well, but has failed through lack of knowledge of practical operating room conditions.

Unquestionably, both Mr. Carroll, City Electrician, and Mr. Bayle, Chief Inspector, wish to do, and are doing, the best they can under the circumstances. If the operators would themselves co-operate with them, instead of too often trying to circumvent and hinder, the net result would be very much better.

The Spring has been remarkably backward. The parks have been open for some time, but owing to chilly weather are not doing much business. Of course all this spells dollars to the motion picture theater men.

It is seldom one finds a man against whom no one has a grouch. Chicago has one, however, in the person of Samuel Levine, manager of the Orpheum, Chicago's largest and finest motion picture theater. Mr. Levine is that rare combination of a hard worker, competent manager and good fellow. This is not merely the verdict of the writer, but of every one who knows him, his employees included, and the man who can exact good service (as Mr. Levine most certainly does) and at the same time retain the liking and good will of his employees is indeed a rarity. The forgoing is not designed as flattery, a "puff" or soft soap, but merely as a word of commendation to one who thoroughly deserves it.

The Chicago branch of the Edison Manufacturing Company, sellers of Edison films and machines, has removed to better and more commodious quarters at No. 90 Wabash avenue. Manager Hardin, the genial pilot of the destinies of this particular link in the Edison chain, apologizes for the move by quoting the old, threadbare "increased business compelled," etc. He ought to be ashamed of himself for getting so much business that his company is obliged to increase its already large expenses by renting larger quarters. The new home is mighty nice, though, and friend Harding wears the smile-that-wont-come-off.

The Olympic, one of Chicago's leading theaters, for years presenting high-class vaudeville, later tried out as a music hall, has gone over to motion pictures bag and baggage. It is a 10-cent house and is reported as doing well.

The Haymarket, another of our big vaudeville houses, has adopted motion pictures, for the Summer at least. This leaves but one vaudeville house in all Chicago—the Majestic.

The George K. Spoor Flm Exchange is adding business rapidly. This is not a "puff" but a statement of facts. In giving the Devil his dues (all film exchange men are supposed to be Devils. Huh?) it must be said that this exchange keeps its films in remarkably good repair. Its inspection department is the best the writer has ever seen.

The Bijou Dream, on State street, is to be remodeled in July or August. Plans are now in course of making. The house will be completely rebuilt as to its interior and front. The floor between the up and down stairs houses will be removed, thus making one theater of what is now two. The decorations and appointments will be very fine, rivaling the magnificent Orpheum next door. Vaudeville, motion pictures, admission 10 cents.

Messrs. Jones, Linick & Schaefer will open a splendid new 1,100-seat vaudeville-motion picture house on Wilson avenue, near Clark street. This company owns most of the loop houses, several fine outlying theaters and many park attractions and theaters. They are decidedly the "big guns" of the Chicago motion picture world.

There are quite a number of the new "Standard" machines being installed in Chicago. It is a little too early yet to pass comment, but the writer has heard no adverse comments on them to date. It is the "no rewinding" feature which makes the hit with this machine.

There has been quite a general shifting of Chicago amusement park managers this season. Mr. Paul D. Howse, who has been general manager of White City since it first opened, is now manager of Sans Souci. There are many new and novel park attractions this season.

Manager Faller, of the Bijou Dream, State street, takes a month's vacation soon. Manager Faller is another of our Chicago Nickel Theatre managers who is in the "good fellow" class and is the right man in the right place. In fact the Jones-Linick-Schaefer Company seem to have the faculty of getting really good men on their payrolls—possibly for the reason that they know a good man when they get him and how to treat him after they have gotten him. Adopting a contrary course is why many employers fall down. They fail to realize that really good men—men who are men—won't accept any old kind of treatment handed them. They give good service and expect and demand decent treatment in return, and this is what the Jones-Linick-Schaefer employees get.

Mr. W. R. Cozart, for so long owner and manager of the Electric Theatre, the second oldest still-in-existence North Side theatre, has sold out and departed for New Mexico. Mr. Cozart expects eventually to land in Roswell, N. M., and there enter the nickel show business, but first will lead the life of a traveling exhibitor for a while. He was secretary of the Chicago Exhibitors' Association while the poor thing lived. He took a splendid outfit for road work with him. Success attend you, old man.

With the approach of summer the usual bunch of nickel theatres is for sale, some of them for almost any old price at all. Many reasons for selling are given, but usually it really is bad location or mismanagement—perhaps both.

The new quarters of the American Film Exchange are commodious and mighty nice. How under heaven the American managed to transact the volume of business it did in the three small rooms occupied by it for so long will ever remain one of the interesting mysteries of the film business. There are those who swear Van Ronkle used to hang the cuspidor out of the window to make more room.

The writer takes this opportunity to thank the machine companies who have sent, or offered to send, machines, rheostats, transformers and other appliances to the writer for inspection and to aid in the preparation of matter for the series of articles titled "Plain Talks to Operators and Managers." The almost universal courtesy extended is highly appreciated. I might add that the articles in question will be put in book form later.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

Bangor, Me.—Augustus G. Perro is making arrangements to open a new moving picture theater here.

Morrison, Ill.—C. C. Shiery, of Chicago, has opened a new moving picture show here.

Sheffield, Ill.—Mr. Vose has sold the moving picture theater here to Peter Schlaf, of Wyanet.

Sterling, Ill.—Clifford Van De Mark has purchased from Loux Brothers the Gem Theater, and has taken possession.

Nelson, Neb.—J. A. Muth is making arrangements to start a new moving picture theater here.

Pekin, Ill.—M. Dittmer will open a new moving picture theater here.

Tucson, Ariz.—P. F. Linton is erecting an airdome on North Stone avenue.

Portsmouth, Ohio.—Gus Sun and O. G. Murray, of the Sun Circuit, will erect a large theater here.

Chisholm, Minn.—O. G. Tucker, of Hibbing, is preparing to erect a new theater here.

Storm Lake, Ia.—N. Sletten, of Merrill, Wis., has purchased the Scenic Moving Picture Theater here, and has taken possession.

Neilsville, Wis.—J. W. Hommel has sold the Electric Theater to J. H. Smith and C. A. Ayelsworth, of Sparta, who will make extensive improvements.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The next time I visit MacLane's Moving Picture Theatre on Third avenue, Brooklyn, I hope I will be more fortunate in the entertainment. Let me explain. I am, as readers of these criticisms should know, by this time, a man of mirth. I like smiles and laughter. They are to me the wine of life. If I had to be perfectly serious for three consecutive hours in any one day I should die. I was born with a smile and I hope to die with one. When I came out of MacLane's Theatre the other night, if I looked as I felt, the passers-by must have taken me for an undertaker's man off duty.

My luck was out and all on account of the unfortunate sequence of pictures which it was my destiny to have to sit under. To begin with, I dislike gloomy subjects on the screen. Everybody knows that by this. And then I distinctly object to the illustration of Bible stories by moving picture. The themes of Holy Writ, in my humble opinion, are distinctly out of place in an amusement house. They are for the church or the home. Imagine my feelings, then, on Wednesday night, when I had to sit through the "Judgment of Solomon," and "Jephthah's Daughter," and finally to again swallow "The Resurrection." Beautiful as these pictures are, nobody in his wildest dreams will claim that they are particularly humorous. In point of fact, there is not a single, solitary smile in all three of them. They saddened me and they saddened the other members of the audience. The moral of all this is that managers of moving picture theatres should avoid monotony in their programs.

I got one smile, however, and that was when the musical accompaniment for the picture of Solomon turned out to be "I Dreamed That I Dwelt in Marble Halls"—a decided anachronism. But the MacLane Amusement Company evidently know how to run a moving picture house. The one I visited is a beautifully fitted place, and it was packed with a large and appreciative audience, whose comfort is well looked after by courteous attendants. Indeed, it seemed as if Brooklyn sent its very best representatives to patronize the show, for around me were a set of high-class looking men, women and children, such as would not have been out of place in New York's most fashionable talking theatre. The house is well provided with exits, seats are comfortable, the operating booth is substantially built, and the total effect one of brightness, brilliancy and warmth. The pictures, too, are well shown, you hardly hear the machine and there is very little movement perceptible on the screen. On the whole, it is a handsome, well-conducted, prosperous looking moving picture theatre.

The MacLane Amusement Company also serve up vaudeville. I object to vaudeville in any shape or form in a moving picture theatre; it interferes with my appreciation of the pictures. I want pictures, and only pictures. A gentleman also played the violin. The only music I care for in a moving picture house is in the orchestra. I think that if moving picture managers would provide a small orchestra of stringed instruments to accompany the pictures the innovation would be appreciated by their patrons generally. The announcement slides at this house might be more elaborate and artistic. They struck me as being somewhat crude and lacking in finish. To conclude: MacLane's Amusement Company is evidently on the right track, in conducting its moving picture houses, and I think it deserves every encouragement in its efforts, which are apparently successful, to attract the support of a good class in the community.

"LA TOSCA."

On June 9th Pathe's released a film on the subject of "La Tosca," as we foretold would be the case in the "Moving Picture World" several weeks ago. This lurid tragedy of Roman life in the early part of the last century formed the theme of one of Victorien Sardou's most celebrated plays. It was also, we believe, converted into an opera. The subject in itself is one that must appeal to moving picture audiences on account of its simplicity and tragedy of theme.

The Climax View Co., 133 W. 23d Street, are not unknown to moving picture men through their business of supplying stereoscopic views to amusement parlors. This connection should stand them well now that they have embarked in the business of making song slides. We have seen the sets for the first two songs and must say that they are well posed, tastefully colored and possess an originality that is a welcome change from the usual thing.

Comments on the Week's Films.

A Child of the Sea. (Kalem.)

Kalem stories are never involved or intricate. Their plots are usually easily followed, and the sentiment of them is generally simple and touching. These are the predominant qualities of the pretty little story which formed the theme of the subject under notice. The first scene is an exceedingly striking one. We have seen it in real plays—notably Charles Reade's "Scuttled Ship;" again, "Alone on the Raft" is a common scene in sea stories. So "A Child of the Sea" starts very powerfully. On the wide waste of waters a raft is seen. Upon it are a man and a woman. We can enter into their sufferings, for we see the man rise and shake a white fabric in the air as if hailing approaching deliverance. But when the deliveries arrive they find the man dead and his wife also no more. When they reach the raft they also see beside the dead bodies the live one of a child. This is, as it were, the prologue of the story. Fifteen years pass and we see the child grown into a girl, who attracts the attentions of a banker's son living in her neighborhood. She yields to his embraces. It is soon evident that he is not sincere in his protestations, for he seeks the hand of another girl more his social equal. Then the fisher-lad lover of the girl witnesses the banker boy's fickle act and subsequently both young men quarrel over the sea waif. She, however, interferes and parts the contestants. The story leads us to the grave of the girl's parents, over which the banker's son tells the girl of his approaching marriage to another woman. On learning this news the girl swoons across the grave of her parents, and there she is found later in the night by her fisher lover, Dan. The little story ends with the mutual embraces of the lovers, who, it is to be assumed, are never more to be parted.

Simple enough in all conscience, but nevertheless a positive relief to many more pretentious stories that are just now being shown on the screen. It is a boy and girl subject and it will please the lovers, a large number of whom always make up an audience. The story is easy to understand, and if there is nothing particularly novel in it, it is at least clearly and convincingly told.

The photographic part of the work has been extremely well done. Indeed the Kalem Company is rapidly attaining a very enviable position in technique. Moreover, the scenes against which the story is photographed are beautiful, natural and pleasant to look at. Here are no painted cloths or made-up buildings, but just the scenes of pretty actuality. The film is cleverly tinted in parts, and altogether "The Child of the Sea" is just one of those pleasing subjects, naturally acted and skillfully photographed, which, we are sure, will successfully appeal to moving picture audiences wherever it is shown.

"The Curfew Bell."—From the Edison studio comes a beautiful film, beautiful in conception and beautiful in technical execution. It is likely that everyone knows the old story of the curfew bell and Cromwell, and in this picture the Edison actors have reproduced it with sufficient power to make it live before one. All the intense dramatic power and interest of the story has been retained, and as Cromwell tells the heroic young woman that her lover shall live one can see the tremor which runs over the audience. The actors all do their work exceptionally well, and the principal character, the girl who prevents the bell from ringing, is particularly strong. Technically the film is up to the Edison standard, even though the subject was particularly difficult to photograph satisfactorily.

"The Cripple's Marriage."—A comedy from the Gaumont studio which contains sufficient absurdities and unexpected situations to keep everybody who sees it laughing.

"The Good Omen."—A Gaumont which introduces a travesty on mistletoe which never fails to make the audience laugh. The film is good technically and the difficulties which beset those who buy mistletoe are funny. Nothing more need be said.

"Oliver Twist."—The Vitagraph people have sent out a film under the above title which is deservedly popular. Nancy Sykes is played by Elita Proctor Otis, and that, together with other parts, form a whole which leaves nothing to be desired so far as the acting and the interpretation of dramatic possibilities is concerned. A long description is scarcely necessary. Everyone knows the story of Oliver Twist, and has sympathized with him in his difficulties. They will do so more than ever after seeing this picture. The acting is unusually good, and, with the exception of a few points, the photographic quality is quite satisfactory. The picture is sure to please critical audiences everywhere and is a sufficiently noticeable achievement to mark the company among the leaders in the business.

"What Drink Did."—A moral lesson is taught in this excellent Biograph film which might have its influence. The dramatic qualities of a temperance story are generally very powerful, and the Biograph actors seem specially fitted to emphasize the dramatic possibilities without weakening whatever of moral strength there may be in a piece. In this instance they have made the most of their opportunity and the picture is very strong. The climax, when the father realizes that his little daughter is dead, is a strong piece of acting, and a sigh of relief involuntarily escapes the audience when the scene changes. The photography is clear and good, like all the Biograph work. The film could be used to advantage by religious and temperance organizations.

"The Lost Heiress."—A Lubin which has some elements of comedy, even if it is supposed to be dramatic. And when all the unfortunates who happened to be near the place where the child was lost receive their drubbing she is discovered asleep, just where she had been all the time since she disappeared. Technically the film is good and the subject is not without its interest.

"Father's Glue."—A Lubin comedy which represents two boys who do things with glue. Like all the Lubin comedies this one is funny and the audience laughs heartily, even while the boys are paying the penalty for their adhesive pranks by getting a good licking.

"An Uninvited Guest."—A Pathe which serves to fill in between heavier pictures and is interesting because of its novelty. Mistaking a thief for an invited guest at a fancy dress ball is a unique conception, and in this picture the most possible is made of it. But the thug gets his deserts and goes to prison.

"Advantages of Aviation."—A satirical piece which represents in an exaggerated way some of the possibilities of aeroplane navigation. It keeps the audience laughing during the entire time it is on the screen.

"Visit to the London Zoological Gardens."—A Pathe record film which has all the pictorial qualities of the Pathe productions. Pictures of this character add immensely to the programmes of traveling shows, or to the programmes of those theaters whose patrons have no opportunity to visit such places. The London Zoological Gardens are among the largest in the world, are fully equipped and contain very many rare animals and birds. In this film they are shown at close range and the characteristic movements are faithfully reproduced.

"Bottled Up."—A Pathe comedy which contains some novel elements. A chemist succeeds in compounding a fluid which transforms everything it touches to a liquid state. The novelty consists in getting the liquid of a thief, the man from whom he stole money and a policeman all in a bottle together. He successfully restores them to their former state and the thief is promptly arrested. Even though this is a comedy it has considerable dramatic interest when the thief, restored to his normal condition, is confronted by his accuser. The technical quality is up to the Pathe standard.

"The Empty Sleeve."—A war picture suitable for the Memorial Day season acted with all the vigor and dash of the Vitagraph Company. Like all the pictures of the war time this has numerous thrilling scenes, in some of which there is great dramatic power. There is something in these pictures in which the war scenes are enacted before one that has a strong appeal and it is difficult to criticise. Sometimes there doesn't appear to be anything to criticise. The actors seem to enter into the spirit of the scenes so sympathetically that criticism seems to be harsh and unnecessary. The change from an old couple walking down the street to the young couple of forty years ago is excellently managed, and the change back, after the war scenes are over, is quite as good. The appearance of the veterans, the speech, and finally the fraternal handclasp of the Union and Confederate soldiers are all strong features and add interest to the picture.

"He Couldn't Dance, but He Learned."—A Vitagraph comedy which introduces a novelty in teaching an awkward young man how to dance. The hypnotic influence is invoked and the erstwhile wall flower finds that he can dance with the best of them. A wooden Indian, a stuffed bear and other impossible things get the same hypnotic fever. The climax is reached when the wall flower wakes up and discovers he has had a pipe dream. The photographic quality of the film is good, and the action is lively and interesting.

"Panther Hunting in the Island of Java."—An Eclipse record picture which gives a reasonably clear idea of the methods employed in hunting panthers, as the title of the film has it. The scenery in the jungle and elsewhere is interesting, but a tendency to soot and whitewash, indicating under exposure in the negative, is noted, and it is so serious in some instances that it mars the picture to some extent.

"How Jones Paid His Debts."—An Eclipse comedy which is funny but has no claim to dramatic power and arouses no more than a mere passing interest. Between two heavier films it is not displeasing.

"A Profitable Marriage."—A Pathe comedy which is not dramatic but develops a number of interesting situations and raises a laugh. Technically it is fair, though not as good in all respects as most of the Pathe output.

"An Obliging Friend."—A Pathe comedy which has some elements of dramatic interest and creates a good deal of sport for the audience. It introduces a novel development of hypnotism, and in that respect is interesting. It is as good as the average comic.

"Annie Laurie."—An Essanay film was shown during the week under this title which contained a suggestion that could be profitably followed by others. The film is really an illustrated version of the famous old song. The soldiers marched away to war, there are battle scenes and the suggested love story in the song is interwoven. Dramatically the film is of high standard, but technically it is not so. The lighting is harsh and there is too much loss of detail under the glaring lights of an under exposed negative. But even with these faults the film is pleasing and the audience broke into vigorous applause at its close. Many of the favorite old songs are susceptible of similar forceful illustration and interpretation.

"A Poor Wife's Devotion."—A Kalem picture with strong dramatic elements which are worked out successfully. It is not too much to say that it is one of the strongest in this respect the company has sent out and marks a distinct advance over their earlier films, indicating that the actors are improving, or are becoming more familiar with the requirements of the silent drama. There are two climaxes which are thrilling, the first where the brother of the intended bride challenges the unfaithful husband to a duel, and the second at the duel when the wife rushes between the combatants and receives the bullet intended for the husband who deserted her and falls dead at his feet. While the subject is somewhat depressing, it has the merit of being of dramatic interest, and in that respect is to be commended. The photographic quality is better than most of the Kalem films which have gone before. There are but few weak points, and in the main the lighting is soft and even. The work of the actors is smooth and seems to be more natural than is sometimes the case with motion picture films.

"A Pig in a Poke."—A bit of comedy from the Kalem studio which introduces some novelties in leaping fences and other high obstructions and in getting out of the water after once jumping in. The photography is smooth and even.

"The Child's Prayer."—In this film from the Edison studio the company has achieved a marked success in the beauty of the photographic quality and in the scenic effects. Some of the pictures are unquestionably as good as were ever shown on a motion picture film and the delicate tones of the sky and the waves are reproduced with fidelity. The power of this picture lies in the simple prayer of the child for her father, who was even then drifting in an open boat, bound hand and foot, and at the mercy of the wind and tide. The little prayer softened the heart of the criminal, saved the mother from murder and the father from a horrible death, yet it seemed so natural that there was no forcing apparent. It is one of the best films the Edison people have ever put out, and while a portion of it is depressing, the ending is happy and the disturbing influences are removed. The Edison people are making great forward strides in the quality of their negatives and the finishing of the positives. No European manufacturers, with all their practice and their thorough understanding and appreciation of the requirements of films, have done better. And each succeeding serious picture that comes from the Edison studio shows this same care in the technical quality. The acting is also improving, indicating that progress is the watchword of the management of that department of the Edison enterprises.

"Prof. Fix Fixed."—A comedy from the Edison studio which represents some good acting on the part of two boys. They create a good deal of disturbance for a fake professor and succeed in breaking up his show, and they do it in such a perfectly natural way that one would think the boys were actually at work before one. The technical quality is good, but the swift movement of the characters in some places detracts from the clearness of the picture.

"Brothers in Arms."—Many manufacturers have attempted to picture the actual scenes on a battlefield, but none have accomplished it so well as this picture from the Edison studios. A detailed description is unnecessary, but an actual battle scene is reproduced, including a battery going into action, the hospital corps, and officers riding like mad here and there delivering orders. The photography is unusually good, and even though the movement is rapid in all instances the picture is perfectly clear. It closes with a tender story of the meeting of two comrades after twenty years' separation, and the acting in this is quite up to the standard of the whole film. Technically and dramatically this film meets all requirements and it was applauded so vigorously that a repetition seemed almost necessary. It is recommended to managers as an educational picture, reproducing actual battlefield scenes.

"Miss Faust."—This travesty upon the well-known Faust of Goethe is a beautiful film technically and it has some comic features about it, but there are other things which deserve censure. For instance, Miss Faust goes to Paradise. Presumably the inference here is the same as is our generally accepted ideas of Paradise. Then why introduce ballets? It seems quite out of place. In other words, the association of ideas is incongruous and will shock a great many people in this country. Perhaps in France, where the Pathes make their films, this would not be true, but it certainly would be here. The conception, aside from that, is well worth seeing. The difficulties of the Devil in satisfying Miss Faust are humorous and must be seen if one hopes to appreciate them. The coloring is faultless and the introduction of clever magical effects and some catchy ballets add to the attractiveness, with the exception mentioned. Ballets are scarcely the thing for Paradise.

"Alphonse Gets in Wrong."—A comedy from the Pathes which illustrates the adventures of a convict and gives, in some detail, his experiences in escaping. There are some funny situations, yet the picture, as a whole, seems to lack point.

"Cricket on the Hearth."—It has come to be well understood among patrons of motion picture theaters that when the Biograph Company undertakes the reproduction of some well-known story it will be excellently done. "The Cricket on the Hearth," adapted from the favorite story of Dickens, is no exception. In this reproduction the characters seem to live again the story before one's eyes and all the hopes and wishes, the disappointments and the heartaches are made so plain that one lives them with the characters and appreciates more than ever before the wondrous beauties of Dickens' tale. It is unnecessary to enter into a detailed description of the play. It is too well known to require that. Nor can any one actor be singled out as doing his part better than any other. The company is too well balanced for that. The love of Edward and May engages the bulk of the attention of the audience, and when Tackleton gives them his blessing the audience applauds. John's acting when he is deciding whether he will enter the room and shoot the old man or not is exceptionally good, and a sigh of relief goes up when he tosses the pistol away. Technically the film is almost beyond criticism. The Biograph pictures are all plain and clear black and white. There is no attempt in this to introduce delicate tones, but the picture is clear and the movement of the characters is so smooth and even that there is no blurring. The picture is good and deserves a long run. The most critical audiences will be pleased with it.

"A Bride Won by Bravery."—Here is one of those active Western dramas from the Lubin studio which are such prime favorites with so many people. The love making is natural. The wrath of the uncle when he sends his niece home because she is flirting, as he terms it, with a cowboy, and the holp-up are all extremely realistic. Then comes along the discharged cowboy, releases the uncle and nephew, rallies the others and storms the stronghold of the robbers, rescuing the girl from the clutches of the greasers. It is all such a mad whirl, and is carried out with so much dash and spirit that the audience is borne along without really appreciating what is occurring before its face. The end, where the uncle gives the couple his blessing, is good and affords a fitting climax to the story which led up to this consummation. Even though there is a good deal of swift movement the blurring is reduced to a minimum and the technical quality of the film is good. In most places the photography is clear. Only here and there little patches show dim and poorly lighted.

"A War Time Sweetheart."—A war drama from Selig which tells a tale of love in an interesting and very lively way. The climax is reached where the girl climbs the tower and swings back and forth with the bell, preventing it from ringing so that the alarm cannot be given that a prisoner has escaped. The despicable rivalry of the colonel is so well played that one wants to walk up to the screen and kick him out of the picture. There is a battle scene which deserves commendation, though the detail of nurses caring for the wounded afterward is left out. In fact, not many were killed or wounded in sight of the audience, a restraint which is to be commended rather than otherwise. The photographic quality of the film is excellent. The scenic features are maintained at a very high standard and the lighting throughout is well managed. The swinging bell is really the only weak point in the lighting, and that is the strongest feature dramatically, so perhaps the weak lighting will be overlooked. While no direct assertion is made that the court martialed prisoner escaped detection, a pioneer family is shown several years afterward which the audience is left to surmise is the same one. The picture is good and was liberally applauded in one well-filled house.

Fighting Bob.—The principal dramatic interest in this Selig picture is the love story which it illustrates. There is the usual accompaniment of an unwilling father, a rejected lover, whom the father wants the girl to marry because he is rich, but the Yankee lieutenant outwits the whole set of Spaniards and marries the girl, succeeds in getting the police and the rest of the rescue party thrown into the water, while he escapes to his ship in a launch. The story is interesting and holds the attention of the audience as long as the film is running, but there is really no great dramatic power attached to it. Fighting Bob is a type of American seaman and does his part well. His men are likewise interesting types and their parts are well acted, and there is liberal applause as the film ends.

His Duty.—The Biograph people have produced a film which has intense dramatic interest and holds the attention closely from the beginning of the plot until the last. The story is dramatic in the development, which forces a policeman to arrest his brother for theft while the brother is celebrating his birthday. The facial expression when the officer finds his brother's cap by the opened safe and, again, when he confronts the brother with the evidence of his crime and declares that he must make the arrest, is well worth studying. It is intensely dramatic. One can scarcely realize that the face can be made to say so much. The picture has all the characteristics for which the Biograph films are popular and the close brings a round of applause for the officer who did his duty regardless of who was affected by his doing it.

"CAB NUMBER 519."

A Strong Dramatic Story by Great Northern.

A well-told detective story is always sure of success either in book form or as a play. We all love mystery; we all love plot; we all love to see how it is woven, and above all things, we all love to see mystery unraveled. Our appreciation of this kind of dramatic writing rises in proportion to the naturalness of the various incidents that make up the story. The famous Sherlock Holmes series of stories, that owe their origin to the brain of Sir A. Conan Doyle, are popular because Holmes, after all, is only a clever man of the world with highly developed reasoning powers. He is not a mere stage detective looking preternaturally wise and relying only upon time-worn expedients. No; he goes about his work in an ordinary matter-of-fact style, plus, of course, a little permissible exaggeration of acumen, and this is why the Sherlock Holmes stories are popular.

In the film under review we are treated to a very melodramatic story, very skilfully worked out, which we think will be popular with all classes of audience. The picture is full of excitement from start to finish. A young man suddently inherits a fortune. The man's friend decides to make himself master of that fortune, and so by the aid of an unscrupulous assistant he manages to kidnap his friend, to impersonate him, and to actually obtain the money. Now, to reach this point a number of startling adventures have to be gone through. The real owner of the fortune is lured into a cab, and is drugged in that vehicle. He is taken on board a ship and placed in a cabin in charge of one of the villains of the piece. But Holmes has been busy. Early on in the game he got the number of the cab and traced it in its wanderings to the house in which the unconscious victim was temporarily placed. Holmes runs the cabman to earth, binds his arms and renders him helpless. Then he starts in pursuit of the ship. He gets on board. He takes the cabin next to that in which the drugged victim lies, and just at the moment when the latter is to be thrown overboard by the man in whose power he is Holmes appears, effects a rescue and knocks the villain down. The final scene of the play shows the impersonator taking possession of the money, when, just as he is handling it, the real owner appears. The impersonator, after denials and struggles, is arrested, and all ends happily, thanks to the skill of Sherlock Holmes. The story is handled clearly and explicitly throughout. It is told against a number of well-chosen scenes and the excitement rises to its greatest height on the deck of the steamer, where the body of the unconscious victim is to be thrown overboard. The drugging in the cab is also an exciting moment. Indeed the play is highly dramatic throughout. The photographs are well executed and the acting all that is required in a piece of this kind.

Melodrama such as "Cab Number 519" does not call for much subtlety of dramatic interpretation; it all has to be plain, decisive and incisive. That is what we get in this story. The film is of the best of its kind. Holmes works on very slender materials; he also works rationally and naturally. There is no straining after effect, and so the impression on the minds of the audience is that of a logical series of incidents leading up to the conventional defeat of villainy and triumph of virtue. And when a story worked out on these lines holds the interest of its audience from end to end, then be sure it will receive the stamp of popular approval.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO ALL EXHIBITORS AND USERS OF GREAT NORTHERN FILMS.

We are advised that patent litigation is threatened to the users of certain films and wish to notify each and every one of our customers that Great Northern films are fully protected from such threatened litigation. We have engaged the following attorneys, Macdonald & Macdonald, No. 50 Church street, New York City; R. B. Cavanagh, Ouray Building, Washington, D. C., and McDonogh, McDonough & McDonogh, of 80 Wall street, New York, and Louisville, Ky., to attend to all litigation brought in connection with the use of our films. We do not believe our customers will be harassed by such litigation, but in case they are, they are instructed to immediately notify our main office in New York City, and steps will be taken to protect their interests.

The above applies to Great Northern Films only.

INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE WITH NEW FILMS.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In your issue of May 8 you had a letter from Mr. Spurrier, of the Savoy Hotel in this city. In reply to this letter I just wish to state that we have an Independent exchange in Seattle, buying the output of the International Projecting and Producing Company as well as several others of the Independent manufacturers.

We have absolutely no old junk, either licensed or independent, that we have renovated to hand to the trade. Every reel of our stock is brand new. We believe that one of the things that will kill the moving picture business more quickly than anything else is this habit which some men have of buying a few reels of old junk, advertising them as independent and then disappointing the trade.

One of the first questions asked us when we have approached exhibitors has been, "How old is your junk?" and we have in some instances had difficulty in convincing them that we are handling only new goods.

Yours very truly,
PACIFIC FILM EXCHANGE.

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—The Board of Censorship seems to be another institution which has been organized for the sole object of giving employment to certain persons and for handicapping the industry with a lot of red tape business.

Is the Board honest in its efforts or are its members incompetent to judge of the subjects? Recently they passed a certain picture in which a fisher maid is locked in a room at the mercy of a villain and after a fierce fight, to save her honor, she manages to break a window and to escape. The scene is entirely too repulsive and I fail to see why they allowed the film to pass.

The Board of Censorship passed on a revolting scene of a barroom picture where the father, under the influence of liquor, fights a barkeeper and sees his little daughter fall at his feet dead from the discharge of a revolver. The excuse of the Board is "strong moral lesson." In this case the Board should not object to the burning of a negro at the stake as a "strong moral lesson" for the brutes who violate women. Under the excuse of "strong moral lessons" most of the worst crimes could be allowed to be shown on the screen. As long as the Board allows a bartender to murder an innocent child as a "strong moral lesson" and to reform a drunkard the Board opens a wide door to show crime.

The Board of Censorship, in passing on another film, describes it as "a well told story": A man who disinherits one of his sons, turns his whole fortune and property, including a new mill, over to his other son. The benefited son is not yet satisfied; he beats and abuses his aged father in the worst manner, kicking him, throwing him on the floor to rob him of his last pennies. When the benefited son has everything and the father, in his old days, is penniless, this brute, to be shamed not be called a son, calls in the poor wagon to convey his aged father to the almshouse. Shame! Shame! This brute, after receiving the wealth of his parent, has not a crust of bread for his father, and the Board of Censorship tells us "a well told story."

Such a picture is criminal and I doubt if with all the criminality credited to New York we could find such a brute of son. As we do not believe that such a son can exist we do not believe that the Board of Censorship is right in allowing such a bad example to be shown to our children, to teach them after having been raised and provided by fond parents, to turn their backs on fathers and mothers, to ill treat them, to abuse them, to rob them and at last to send them to the poor house and to the potter's field. Has the Board of Censorship been instituted to inculcate such bad examples to our new generation?

No Board of Censorship would be preferable than a careless Board, as then fathers and mothers would not rely on the work of the Board of Censorship, but would themselves investigate the pictures, before allowing their children to visit the shows.

AN EXHIBITOR.

A SUGGESTION.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Hardly a week passes that I don't read your publication, "The Moving Picture World," and, believe me, it is with great pleasure that I do so. Your edition of May 15 contains some of the best articles I have had the pleasure of reading for some time in regard to singing of illustrated songs and operation, and I enjoy them most because I am both a singer and m. p. operator.

One article in the edition mentioned above is extremely interesting to me. It is in regard to "The Value of Lantern Slides on Advertisements for Sheet Music."

I heartily agree with the author of that article. There are few good ballad singers in the United States to-day, and I don't want you to think that I am boasting, for I have more than made good in my work. I am a ballad singer, and right here in Peoria I can truthfully say that I have sold for the different publishers hundreds of copies of sheet music, songs of class, or rather the high-class ballads. For instance, Chas. F. Adams here is the publisher of "If My Heart Could Only Speak," and he can vouch for me that I have, by singing the song here, sold over a hundred copies for him, and I only sang it two days, for we are required to change our songs every two days.

There is one suggestion that I would like to make to you, for you are a writer and I am not. The suggestion is this:

I would like to see an article from your pen in regard to publishers employing good singers to sing their publications in the first-class picture shows of the country; not in work shops, but in the good houses. This can be done, and at a great profit to the publishers and the owners of the houses where the songs are sung.

I am really surprised that publishers of songs don't take such action with their songs; for instance, I can sing ballads, and when I say sing, I mean sing, but when it comes down to coon songs and Indian songs I am not there. I get by with them, but I know that I can't be beat rendering—which means to butcher and cut up the eccentric songs that are sent here to the house by the exchange. And publishers make a great mistake by not taking up this part of the song business.

So if you will kindly consider the above for the interest of the publishers and the good singers I know it would be appreciated by all.

Wishing you and your magazine the greatest success and prosperity, I am

Very truly yours,
JOHN B. DILLON.

Peoria, Ill., May 25, 1909.

WARNING TO WOULD-BE OPERATORS.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Enclosed find slips cut out of the evening editions of the Boston American advertising for men to learn to operate moving picture machines. There are dozens of operators out of work in and around Boston. The chief cause of it is these school-learned operators, of which there are a great number, find that when they get a license there are more operators than the demand calls for, even at the busiest season when business is at its best. When a chance of a job comes along they go and offer themselves for $10 or $12 a week. This makes it so that when a decent operator applies for a job and he asks anything around $20 a week he is laughed at and told that there are dozens of operators who will work for $12 a week. I know this to be the truth, for I applied myself a few weeks ago and I asked for $22 a week of seven days, to run continuous Saturday and Sunday, and I was told the same thing. I know of several other operators who have been told the same. In one instance one operator offered to work for $12 a week, and that to the owner of three houses, two seating over a thousand and one seating five hundred, and doing a great business, too. Just think it over, some of you operators; a man offering to work for $12 a week for a man who could well afford to pay the union wages. Who is to blame for this? Nobody but the operators themselves. Then, again, the union ought to do something to combat the advertisements inserted daily in the Boston evening papers for men to become operators at the beaches and Summer resorts. What I would suggest is this: The Operators' Union to insert an ad. something after the style of the following, viz: "Warning to all intending to become M. P. operators. The M. P. O.'s Union wish it to be known that there are hundreds of efficient operators now out of work through the closing down for the Summer of more than half the picture houses in the State of Massachusetts alone."

I think that would have a tendency to decrease the number of students in the schools (3), because when they do succeed in getting a license they find it hard to get a job owing to lack of experience. In nine cases out of ten they will agree to go to work for $10 or $12 a week to enable them to get the experience. I think the best way to remedy the evil would be for the operators of Massachusetts to have a grand rally in Boston, both union and non-union men, as far as possible, for all to attend throughout the State. I say "throughout" because of the fact that there are not 10 per cent. of the men outside of Boston in the union.

I am a non-unionist myself, but I would willingly join if all the operators would get together, so that something could be done and officers and delegates elected to do the work that would be necessary for the organization. As there are about one thousand operators in Massachusetts alone a strong union could be formed to combat these schools and cheap operators. The way things are going operators will soon be working for $6 or $8 a week. I have been looking for a job for the last six weeks, and wherever I go I am met with the same old gag, "We can get operators for $12 a week." I am just about getting disgusted, for I might as well hunt for a needle in a haystack as look for a job at anything over $12 or $15 a week.

Hoping that you will find room in your valuable paper for this letter, I remain Yours truly,

AN OPERATOR.

Lawrence, Mass, May 25, 1909.

[The advertisements to which our correspondent refers are as follows: "Men to become moving picture operators; $20 weekly; Summer theaters open in two weeks. Moore Amusement Co., 220 Tremont street." "We need a few more men for operators of moving picture machines at the beaches; $20 per week. Moore Amusement Co., 220 Tremont street; open evenings." On the face of them there is nothing nefarious in those advertisements. What is wanted is, of course, a union of all operators in the country to agree upon a settled minimum wage.—Editor M. P. W.]

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley. You can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

On May 22nd, apropos of moving picture stories, I wrote: "Good moving picture stories are scarce. Not that they are not written or offered for sale, but that those who set themselves up as picture story editors are not qualified to make the selection." This innocent remark has got me into trouble. People are saying unkind things of me. They say I have a grouch against the manufacturers because I wrote some moving picture stories and they were rejected. This is absurd.

As a matter of fact I did write two moving picture plays. Three manufacturers saw one and sent it back to me. The second piece I wrote was sent to a manufacture about two months ago. It is either lost, stolen, or strayed, and the result of all my efforts to get it back is an expression of regret and a promise to search for the missing document! I shall probably never recover it, but I am waiting anxiously to see if the story, which is at least original, makes its way on the moving picture screen. Such things have happened before. Here ends my experience in writing stories for moving pictures. I shall not trouble about the matter any more. It does not pay, except in respect of getting experience; and that doesn't swell my bank balance.

Now, the strictures I made a fortnight ago were made in respect of some newer entrants into the moving picture field, of whom I wrote from personal observation. These people are very green at the game. They are either vamping up old stories or buying them at $10.00 rates, and the results are hardly uplifting. In other words, they are not getting the best stuff available. It is to be had, but, as I have pointed out over and over again, not at $5.00 or $10.00 a time.

A BAD BARGAIN.

So many complaints have reached us as to the trashy nature of the text books advertised in several papers by the Driben Pub. Co., London, Ont., Can., that we again warn our readers not to purchase these books unless sent on approval.

The Squaw's Revenge

A Story of the West as It Was Twenty Years Ago.

This is a story of love and revenge, dealing with the adventures of a cowboy and his sweetheart from the East. The first scene shows the cowboy's sweetheart in a clump of trees. He has just received a letter from [illegible] mother, who are coming from the East. He and [illegible] have parted, through a lovers' quarrel, for several months. Meanwhile in the West he has taken up with an Indian girl and is leading a happy life. Upon receiving the letter he tells her that they must go back to her people. She pleads to stay, but to no avail. The party from the East arrive, escorted by his cowboy friends. The squaw sees him embrace the white girl and vows revenge. She returns to her people, tells the Indian chief and plans to capture the girl. She meets the cowboy, who is leading [illegible] to the Indian camp. The cowboy, upon seeing the squaw, starts in pursuit, overtakes a canoe over the [illegible] river, where the squaw forces her to get into it, and, after struggling in the water, tries to borrow a canoe from an Indian, who refuses him. He fights for it and wins, takes the Indian's canoe and starts in pursuit. The squaw has arrived at the Indian village, where a war dance is in full sway. The prisoner is tied to a stake. The Indians resume the dance. The squaw returns to the landing place and meets the cowboy as he arrives. She taunts him and tells him that the girl will be burned at the stake. He binds her, takes her skirt and blanket, creeps into the Indian camp and rescues the girl. Then there is a chase through the woods to the river bank into a canoe. The Indians follow, showing a canoe chase down the river. Then is shown the cowboy landing and the flight on horseback back to the shack. The mother is found anxiously awaiting their return. The stage arrives and we next see them on their way back to the East, his cowboy friends giving a hearty god-speed in true Western style.

This is one of the strongest and best Indian pictures ever turned out by any motion picture company.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE VIOLIN MAKER OF CREMONA.—The powerful influence of the greater love. True, unselfish love is as rare as radium and much more precious, as it is the one quality that likens the mortal to the celestial and sanctified. Men have become martyrs, sacrificing even life for that love. In this Biograph picture is shown a demonstration of it that is most touching, not to say thrilling. In the little Italian city of Cremona there dwelt Taddeo Ferrari, a violin maker and student of Andrea Amati, the most famous of the craft. Ferrari's pretty daughter, Giannina, was beloved by one of his apprentices, Sandro. Filippo, a crippled youth and the best violin maker in Cremona, also loved the girl with a pure, holy affection that is more spiritual than material, but realizing his unattractiveness through his deformity, suffers his hopelessness with resignation. Yearly there is a prize of a precious chain of gold awarded to the maker of the best violin, and all the apprentices strive to win it. On this occasion, however, the hand of Giannina is to be bestowed upon the most proficient craftsman, and this induces the young men to make extra efforts to win. Sandro fully appreciates the rare talent of Filippo and feels sure his wonderful skill will win his sweetheart from him. Crushed and despairing he seeks out Giannina and tells her his fears, she tearfully acknowledging the strength of his reasoning. While thus occupied they are overheard by Filippo, who sees what woe his success would mean for her, and thinking only of her happiness, through his great love for her he makes a great sacrifice. Going to his room he takes his instrument and goes and places it in Sandro's box, taking Sandro's violin and putting it in his own. Sandro, however, thwarts the good intention of Filippo by exchanging the instruments, not knowing what Filippo had done, thereby upsetting the planned munificence of the cripple. When the instruments are placed in competition, and the prizes are about to be awarded, Sandro's conscience pricks him, and calling the cripple aside, confesses his deed. Filippo, bursts into taunting laughter, telling him what he, himself, had done, and now he spoiled it all. Judgment is passed and Filippo is, of course, the victor. The chain is placed about his neck, and the hand of Giannina placed in his. But also, he feels she recoils, and thinking only of her happiness he crashes his violin over his knee, thereby putting himself out of the contest and making Sandro the winner. He then places the chain about Sandro's neck, and handing the girl over to him he rushes from the hall. We finally leave him alone in his room, crushed and dejected, yet contented in the thought that he had made her happy. Length, 963 feet.

THE LONELY VILLA.—There is something spooklike in the title of this Biograph subject, but we hasten to say that the incidents are of a decidedly material nature, and also claim the story to be most intensely thrilling, gripping the spectator from start to finish. Mr. Robert Cullison resides in a very beautiful country villa, far removed from contiguous neighbors, and about twenty miles from the city. He is expecting a visit from his mother, who is to arrive in the city from the West the next morning. The intelligence is learned by a couple of crooks, who plan to get Cullison away over night by sending him a fake letter by an apparently idiotic country bumpkin which reads: "Robert—Have taken an earlier train. Will arrive in New York 10:30 P. M. Meet me with car. Mother." He gets ready, as it is now nearly 8 o'clock, and while he is bidding adieu to his wife and three young children, the bumpkin is taking in the place under the pretense of dozing in the doorway. Realizing he is leaving them alone, he warns his wife to be sure to fasten the doors and windows securely, also leaving her a revolver from which the disguised bumpkin slyly extracts the cartridges. Off he goes and is not out of sight when the crooks begin their work. Bursting in the front door with a bar they alarm the folks and throw them into a dreadful panic, as they feel their abject helplessness. Out on the road we see the husband speeding further away from them, when suddenly his machine becomes disabled and he is obliged to halt at a roadside inn. Here an idea strikes him to telephone his wife of his possible delay, when in answer he receives the alarming cries of his terrified wife intermingled with the thumping of the burglars, who are slowly but surely breaking their way into the sitting-room. He reminds her of the pistol, but alas it is empty and harmless. Back and forth go the wailings of the wife and the encouraging words of the husband; suddenly all is still. The burglar has cut the wire. Rushing out of the inn he finds his auto far from available, so he calls a policeman and they enlist the services of a gypsy wagon. Up the road they go at a breakneck speed, and during all this time the burglars are working from room to room, getting closer and closer to the frightened little family, who has as the last stand huddled in the library. Crash goes the door, in leap the sinister dogs, but at the same time in rushes the husband with the police and friends, so the burglars will have ample time to taunt each other with "I told you so." Length, 750 feet.

A NEW TRICK.—This is one of the cleverest bits of comedy the Biograph has yet turned out, being short and snappy. A young lady while strolling through the park drops her purse, which is picked up by a fellow walking in her wake. She accuses him, but he "beats it." At this moment a couple of Rah! Rah! boys come up and learning of her loss promise to get it back. By a short cut they get ahead of the miscreant, and meeting a painter, procure his pot of red paint and pallet knife. Smearing the knife with the gorey paint, one lies down with it stuck under his arm. The other cries for help and then hides. The thief runs up and is horrified at what appears to be a murder. Out jumps the other boy and denounces him as the murderer. Circumstantial evidence is so strong that the thief is forced to disgorge, and the purse is returned to the fair maiden. Length, 223 feet.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

THE LEGEND OF STERLING KEEP.—Briefly, the legend avers that whomsoever should sleep in the keep room would sleep for fifty years, or awaken in the morning to find his road clear to a kingship. Lord Plantoro, coming to wed Guinevere, daughter of Lord Sterling, hears this ancient legend chanted by minstrels at the betrothal banquet and vows to sleep in the keep. He does so, but Guinevere in the night, with the aid of friends, changes things in the room to give an appearance of great age. Disguises in the morning help carry out the joke. Planoro's mind is unhinged, however, and the Mitred Abbot, Benedict, compels Guinevere to consecrate her life to him at the altar. Years later, however, in a beautiful scene, his mind is restored in a novel manner. This is only a bare suggestion of the story, however. Its beauty and strength can be appreciated only in the viewing of it. App. length, 1,000 feet.

THE BOOTS HE COULDN'T LOSE.—"And the cat came back" is a phrase that could not mean more to the sufferer from chronic feline persistency than the "boots came back" to the Hon. Mr. Scruggles, who sought to relieve his domicile of the presence of some annoying footgear. No human hands brought them back, that's what gave Mr. Scruggles his greatest perplexity, they brought themselves back. Their energetic soles were the very essence of animation. They chased their owner along dusty highways; they went faster than he had ever been known to make them go when they were establishing fine corn patches on his pedal extremities. He harkened to the call of the country and carried them far afield, but despite his best efforts they beat him back to the house and were calmly reposing in his sitting room when he returned, out of breath and with a feeling of triumph in his bosom. He loved his home and he certainly found it hard work to get rid of them until, in a violent rage, he ordered his butler, with a threat of losing his position if he failed, to make sure they would never return again. The butler did his best, but he would have encountered inglorious failure in his effort had it not been for the presence of a pair of opera slippers, high-heeled and coquettish, near the spot where the animated boots were thrown by the butlers hands. The opera slippers were feminine, of course, and they made such eyes, or should we say toes, at the heavy boots that they forgot their home, forgot all else but the charm of the slippers and remained to woo—Mr. Scruggles and his pleasant home sunk to oblivion in bootly thoughts.

It is an interesting picture, one of the "trick" variety, full of humor and something of a type that has never been seen before. App. length, 600 feet.

BUYING MANHATTAN.—It is three hundred years, exactly, since Henry Hudson sailed his little craft, the Half Moon, past Manhattan Island and up the river that now bears his name. His were the first European's eyes to gaze on what was afterwards to become the site of the second greatest city in the world, this narrow, rocky island held in the embrace of river and bay. Hudson had nothing whatever to do with the settlement of New York, yet it is fitting that in this, the year marking the three hundredth anniversary of his exploit, the event should be celebrated by a film production dealing with an event to which his discovery directly led—the purchase of the Island of Manhattan from the Indians by the Dutch. It is fitting because the growth of New York is the richest fruit of Hudson's adventure.

No force of arms was employed against the peaceful Manhattan tribe which inhabited this island. The Dutch saw what they wanted and went about securing their desire in a manner typical of them; they negotiated with the Indians and in a business deal purchased the island for goods to the value of twenty-four dollars in our money. The value of New York City to-day runs up into the billions class, yet the Manhattans thought they had gotten the best of the Dutch in their bargain.

It is this event portrayed in the film. Leaving the Dutch settlement, Peter Minuit sailed up the island shore to a point near the Indian encampment, negotiated with the Indians around their council fire, and the trick was done. At the landing on the shore the film opens and the scenes following are beautiful, picturesque and ably developed, showing the cupidity of the Indians, their amusement over getting so much gooods from the white men for so little in return and closing with a panoramic view of New York of today, demonstrating what the white man really got. App. length, 400 feet.

TEN NIGHTS IN A BARROOM.—This story is based upon the celebrated drama of that title, a story stronger and more impressive than any temperance lecture ever delivered from rostrum or preached from pulpit.

The story is replete with the most thrilling and dramatic incidents, and for a full half century has enthralled and educated the vast multitude of the entire English speaking world. It shows the terrible influence of alcohol and its curse upon those who have not the power or fortitude to combat its temptation.

Joe Morgan, an honest young workman, beloved and honored by all, a respected husband, father and friend, held in the highest esteem by his employers. His character and habits were temperate and upright. He shunned the saloon as one would shun sure death.

The story tells of his terrible downfall, when upon one day he is lured by two "friends" to take his first drink. The demon rum takes possession of him, he becomes intoxicated and reckless, and his employer, finding him in that condition, takes him home. The wife is horrified and grief stricken. His conscience is stirred and he resolves never again to yield to temptation. But the poison is in his nerves and the next day finds him again at the barroom. The patient wife, waiting for his return, suspects the cause of his absence and sends her little seven-year-old daughter to the saloon. Here follows a most pathetic scene. The child enters the bar as the father, in a drunken frenzy, raises a chair to strike another drunken brawler. The little one confronts him. He is sobered at once and allows the innocent little one to lead him away and take him home. More promises are made, but, of course, the demon's work is not completed. He sinks lower and lower, until, discharged by his employer, he becomes the degraded drunkard whose constant haunt is the barroom, and the wife and child are reduced to poverty and hunger. The pitiful episode of these nights in a barroom is brought to a tragic ending. The little child enters the place to coax her father home, when, in the midst of a usual barroom fight, the child is struck with a large beer glass and falls senseless. Morgan is sobered again, and taking the child in his arms staggers home with her.

He is now a nervous wreck and beneath the dreadful strain is overcome by an attack of delirium tremens. Thanks to the patience and devotion of a loving wife, he and the child are nursed back to health.

Morgan has had his lesson; it has been a bitter one and has caused much suffering, but from this sorrow and evil comes much good. The drunkard is reformed, he becomes an ardent teetotaler and temperance worker. He is re-established and advanced in his position, and we see him, several years later, united with his once more happy family, an honored man and an ornament to society. Length, 992 feet.

GAUMONT.

A MOTHER'S CHOICE.—In a beautiful villa, at the Riviera, a young and attractive widow and her son make their home. Both are happy in each other's company and the deepest sympathy possible exists between the two.

Several years have passed since the husband's death and the bereavement experienced has lost its pangs. The attentions of a gentleman caller are being accepted by the young woman and when the latter proposes marriage he is looked upon with favor. The little lad, however, cannot bear to think of another taking his father's place and shows a marked lack of confidence in the gentleman. This causes the mother to weep, because she loves her new acquaintance. The lad cannot bear to see her cry and so he resigns himself to the inevitable. The mother marries the man and for a time all appears to be happy. The step-father is jealous of his wife's son and makes every effort to have the boy removed. Accordingly a distant college is suggested and the little fellow taken thereto for his education. One night the boy leaves the institution to return to his home, where he arrives foot-sore and almost starved. The father is about to eject him when the mother appears and interposes herself. Forced to make a definite choice the woman chooses her son and the man departs. Son and mother are again left to share their joy and sorrow. Length 806 feet.

A STRONG DIET.—Having served a sumptuous meal the hostess announces to the guests that she has served them bull-steak. One of the guests, seeing an opportunity for some innocent amusement, appropriates a pair of mounted horns, which he attaches to his head. Consternation overcomes the party and all hasten from the room upsetting everything in their anxiety to get out of harm's way. On the street the man creates wild excitement by his actions and the police, unable to apprehend the fellow, telegraph to Spain and a "cuadrilla," a corps of bull-fighters, is sent on to Paris. A novel feature is that the message as transmitted over the wires is in full view of the audience. The humorist makes a stubborn fight, but finally gives up. Length, 598 feet.

HISTORICAL FAN.—A delightfully pleasing and beautifully hand-colored series of panoramic views, giving the history of the fan. A large ostrich feather fan opens and closes alternately, showing each time a different scene and the various styles of fans in use throughout ages and by many peoples. Scenes illustrated are: Adam and Eve—The Egyptians—The Greeks—Romans—Sixteenth Century—Modern Use. Length, 278 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

TWO HEROES.—The daughter of a noble earl is in love with a young man of the town, but because he does not occupy an exalted position in the army he is objectionable to the earl. This causes the brave young fellow to enlist and seek the requisite honors. In the meantime another suitor appears and this time meets the parental requirements, but is refused by the young lady. Her heart beats only for the one and because she cannot have the man of her choice she enters a monastery.

Several years later the soldier returns and visits the monastery, but the lady now refuses him and is faithful to her vows. Later the war breaks out and after a battle the young lady in the discharge of her duties as a sister of mercy visits the battle field where she finds her lover wounded. As the two endeavor to pick their way from the scene of battle a shower of shot from the enemy's camp brings both down and they lie clasped in each other's arms, heroes in a noble cause. Length, 564 feet.

THE RACE COURSE.—This series of views was secured at Saurakarta, a city of the Dutch East Indies, capital of a province having a population of about 110,000 inhabitants. It is the residence of one of the Rajahs, which Holland still maintains, nominally at least, at the head of the population of the Isle of Java.

These views are very interesting and curious, especially the oxen race, a spectacle never before witnessed by the American public.

The order of views: The Official Grandstand—The Arrival of the Rajah—The Race Course—The Obstacle Race—The Race of the Oxen—The Winners. Length, 436 feet.

THE LITTLE ANGEL OF ROARING SPRINGS.—The scene is laid in a rough Western mining camp. No church has ever been built in Roaring Springs, and no services have ever been held. The miners are a rough-and-ready class of men, good hearted and all that, but not much given to piety. One day a roving evangelist, of the type well known in the West, wanders into the camp, and finding no church there, decides that it is a good place to begin operations. He accordingly advertises an open-air meeting at which a collection will be taken for a new church. The meeting is held, but the miners hoot and jeer the proposition and there is not a single response except from Rattlesnake Pete's little boy, who drops a lonesome dollar into the hat. The next scene shows the evangelist saving the life of the little boy, who has fallen over a precipice. The miners in return for his bravery overload the minister with more than enough money to build his church, but he prizes the first dollar received from the little boy most of all.

THE MAGIC SWING shows how Mr. and Mrs. Hen Peck went to Luna Park. How Henry succeeded in stopping the old lady and how he went up against a very mysterious swing which robbed him of his fair charmer each time he tried it, but utterly failed him when he tried it on his wife.

THE LITTLE PEACEMAKER.—The opening scene shows a young man calling upon his sweetheart. He requests her to play upon the piano, and while she is rendering a favorite selection he picks up a book and starts to read. He becomes so engrossed he does not notice she has ceased playing, and when she turns and finds him reading instead of listening to her playing, she becomes enraged and sends him away, vowing never to speak to him again. However, the young man loves the girl, and the next morning we find him at his office, very much cast down. The office boy is a bright youngster and quickly discovers the reason for his employer's downheartedness. He tries to persuade him to call upon the girl and ask forgiveness, but with no result. The boy now hits upon an idea. He goes to the young lady's home and asks her to forgive his employer, but this she will not do. He now evolves another idea. He writes two notes, one to the girl and one to his employer, telling each that he has been hit by an automobile and wants them to come and see him. He gives the notes to a messenger boy for delivery and going home gets into bed to make good his bluff. Both the girl and the employer are very fond of the office boy and immediately upon receipt of the notes they hurry away to his home. When the sweethearts see each other their expressions and actions show they cannot pass without the want of an embrace. The boy slides out of bed, takes the hand of the girl and puts it into the hand of her sweetheart. Reconciliation follows.

THE HUSTLING ADVERTISER.—Mr. Bum, proprietor of the Bum Soap Company, advertises for a man who will place his product before the public, and as a result he procures a very energetic young fellow. This young man has peculiar ideas,

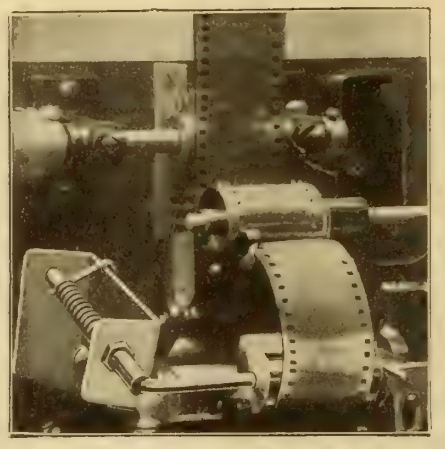
GET THE FILM STEADIER
It Prevents Motion Pictures from Affecting the Eyes
ASSURES A GREATER PATRONAGE
PROLONGS THE LIFE OF FILMS
PREVENTS THE WEAR AND TEAR OF MACHINES



The Film Steadier is the greatest and latest invention for Motion Pictures, and fits any standard machine. It solves the problem of how to get people into your theatre who never attend a Moving Picture Exhibition because it injures their eyes to look at Motion Pictures. Exhibitors using the Film Steadier need not fear losing the patronage of children because the Juvenile Courts are passing laws to prohibit the young from attending Motion Picture exhibitions. This little device is assurance against any such legislation affecting your business. It positively eliminates the great objectionable feature—injuring the eyes—in moving pictures, by stopping the jumping and quivering of the pictures on the screen, and it does more—and makes it impossible to project anything else but a perfect picture, no matter whether the films be new or worn. You can exhibit any films with absolute assurance of obtaining a perfect and excellent picture when you use the Film Steadier.

IT PROLONGS THE LIFE OF FILM FULLY DOUBLE

No exhibitor should be without this new device. It will pay for itself in a very short time, in the wear and tear it saves your machine, to say nothing about the increased business you will derive.

THE FILM STEADIER IS YOURS FOR $7.50

Sent prepaid when cash accompanies the order, or we will send it C. O. D. All you have to do is to try it. It is then you will be convinced that it's the most profitable attachment for a Moving Picture Machine ever devised. Therefore, tell us the name and make of your machine and order it now, or write for more particulars, and remember that if, after trying it, you decide it is not all we claim, return it to us and your money will be refunded.

and he starts out with the intention of making Bum Soap famous throughout the city. The result: Bum Soap is advertised on men's backs, the sidewalks, horses, and, in fact, everything in his path is labeled "Bum Soap."

SAUCY SUE.—Sue is a mischievous kind of a country girl. She plays tricks on all with whom she comes in contact, not even forgetting "Paw" and "Maw." Receiving an invitation from the uncle doctor in town to come for a visit, she leaves for town. Her city cousin is very much pleased to see her—nit. Auntie tries to dress her in city clothes, with disastrous results. When Sue butts in with the patients, the doctor thinks it is time for her to go. He sends her home again, but his troubles do not end until the train has pulled out.

A CORK LEG LEGACY.—The wife died and left a will in which she states that all the real estate belongs to her daughter, while to the husband she leaves her cork leg to reward him for his loving affection. The husband is furious. He takes the cork leg and throws it out of the window, where it is picked up by a passing tramp. Hardly has he done this when an envelope is brought to him which has just been found in his wife's writing desk. In this envelope is a note, stating that the cork leg contains a check for $100,000. Immediately the husband exits to look for the leg, but it has disappeared. Vainly the tramp tried to offer the leg to poor sufferers. When he sees there is no value attached to it, he throws it upon the ashpile, from where it is removed by the ashman and carried to the dump. The excited husband follows the trail of the tramp. When he finds him at last and tells him the leg contained $100,000, the poor tramp faints dead away. They return to the dump and arrive just in time to be covered with a load of ashes, but the leg has been found and so has the check.

THROUGH JEALOUSY.—Ella Walker receives a visit from a suitor, who is coldly received, however, as her heart belongs to Tom, her father's secretary, who is secretly in love with Ella, but thinking her so far above him does not dare to show his love.

Ella visits the office and at an opportune moment offers flowers to Tom, which he politely accepts and lays upon his desk. Ella thinks herself slighted and leaves in anger.

Tom writes a letter to his mother:

My Dear Old Sweetheart:

I can hardly write. I shall be so glad to see you again. Enclosed hundred dollars, part for the trip, part for your dear self. Let me know at once when I shall hold you in my arms and kiss the sweetest of all faces. With love, Your devoted TOM.

The mother immediately sends the following answer in reply:

My Darling Tom:

Just received your letter. You are the dearest boy on earth. I will be there in ten days. How I long to kiss your true eyes.

In haste, with a thousand kisses,
YOUR OLD SWEETHEART.

Tom receives the letter in his office. While he leaves his desk, Ella enters. She happens to perceive the letter and reads it. Here, she thinks, she has found the explanation of Tom's coolness. Raging with jealousy, she leaves the office.

Just then her father comes in. He has bought a new pistol, which he shows Tom. Going back to his desk, he handles the revolver, the trigger snaps and a bullet strikes him in the head. The shot brings Ella to the scene. She just enters the door as the pistol falls from her father's hand and as Tom jumps up from his chair to aid his employer.

The ring of the shot brings some others to the scene—two policemen and some employees.

Driven by jealousy, Ella accuses Tom of having shot her father. Tom is arrested and placed in jail.

The mother arrives and is informed that her son is in jail for attempted murder. She spurns the idea, especially after the letter she received, which she shows to Ella. Now Ella sees her mistake: this is the sweetheart of whom she had been jealous. She confesses to the mother and both hurry to the District Attorney's office, where they explain matters.

Tom is given his freedom. Ella confesses her jealousy, the lovers are united, and Ella promises never to be jealous again.

PROFESSOR WEISE'S BRAIN-SERUM INJECTOR.—Professor Weise discovered a new brain serum and immediately starts out to try it. He succeeds beyond expectations. At the end he is given a dose of his own medicine.

PATHE FRERES.

THE BLUE LEGEND.—A devoted couple are living happily in their simple country home. The man, being a violinist, passes his leisure time playing for his loving wife, who always manifests a deep appreciation for his efforts to amuse her while she is attending to her household duties. The bright rays of happiness are soon darkened by the black clouds of sorrow, for one day, as the good wife is going through a lonesome road in the mountain, she is attacked by two robbers. The frightened woman fights hard to protect herself from her assailants, but after taking her few little trinkets of value they leave her prostrate on the ground. A neighboring woman hears the screams of the victim, and, after recognizing her, hastens away to inform the unlucky woman's husband. The latter, upon hearing of the attack, hurries to the scene of the crime and finds his wife in a truly serious state. He carries her to their home, where she is put to bed, but the unfortunate woman is unable to survive, and while the loving husband plays her favorite tunes on the violin, she peacefully passes away. Length, 410 feet.

THE PULVERIZER.—This is one of the most interesting and clever trick pictures which we have ever been fortunate enough to present to the public. The picture opens showing the interior of a laboratory where a man has invented a powder which, when poured upon an object, causes the same to immediately pulverize. A couple of mischievous youngsters steal the can of powder, and going up to the roof, they throw the wonderful stuff down the chimney. Next we see the interior of the house, where the powder has a marvellous effect upon everything on the mantelshelf over the fireplace. We see the clock, candlesticks, statues and bric-a-brac all crumble into a dust which blows up the chimney and settles down in a heap on the sidewalk below. The youngsters then gather it up and carry it in a basket back to the garret, where, after shaking some more of the magic powder upon the heap of ruins, we see them again attain their normal condition. Length, 531 feet.

LA TOSCA.—The opening scene of this powerful drama reveals the interior of the dressing room of Floria Tosca, a public singer, who is in love with a young artist named Mario Cavaradossi. The happy lovers are together when Baron Scarpia, who is chief of police and a man greatly feared by all, enters and imperiously demands a private audience with Tosca. Mario reluctantly retires, and when Scarpia finds himself alone with the woman whom he intends winning, he immediately makes ardent love to her. But she will have none of him and when he tries to embrace her she calls for help, whereupon Mario rushes in and strongly denounces the cowardly villain, who leaves the place, vowing vengeance.

While passing through the public square in front of the theater, Scarpia is attracted by a great multitude of people, and, upon investigation finds that a political demonstration is in progress and that some strong speeches are being made against the government. He, therefore, loses no time in placing Angelotti, the leader, under arrest. At this juncture Tosca and Mario come upon the scene, and, being friends of the accused man, plead with the heartless wretch to have mercy and release him. Scarpia, hungry for revenge, pays no heed to their lea, whereupon Mario denounces him as a monster nd swears that he will aid the prisoner, even at he risk of his own life.

In the next picture we see the dungeon at Fort t. Ange, where Angelotti is imprisoned, awaiting he sentence of death. Mario, true to his vow, omes to the place and throws a note through the indow, informing the doomed man that in the loaf f bread and supposed jug of water he will find he necessary articles to help him make his escape. he prisoner, overjoyed at the news, finds a file n the bread and a rope in the jug, and, when all s still, he files away the bars of the window and ets himself down with the rope. Mario stands vaiting for him at the edge of the wall, but, just s they are about to steal away, a sentinel catches ight of the fleeing pair, and, after firing on them, ushes with the news of the escape to Baron Scarpia. The latter, realizing that the prisoner is being ided by Mario, goes direct to the home of Tosca, here the fugitive has found shelter. Upon hear- ng Scarpia at the gate, Mario bids the fugitive ide in a well. Scarpia then enters in a terrible age. He accuses Mario of harboring the criminal, ut the artist denies all knowledge of the fugitive's whereabouts. Scarpia threateningly demands where Angelotti may be, and warns Mario that torture will conquer his reticence. All during this stormy nterview Tosca clings to her lover, and Scarpia, in jealous rage, gives orders to have the artist's ead bound in a fillet of steel. With fiendish cruelty Scarpia asks the questions, and as Mario refuses to livulge the hiding place, the torture is made more severe, until Mario falls fainting in the arms of Tosca. Unable to bear the anguish longer, the ter- rified woman divulges the secret, and as the officers ake the prisoner from the well he falls dead at heir feet from the effects of poison which he has taken.

The next picture reveals the interior of Scarpia's apartment, where he sits at his desk and writes the death sentence of Mario, thinking that, once he is out of the way, he, himself, will have some chance with Tosca. Through an open door we see the doomed man being led to be tortured, followed by his devoted and heartbroken sweetheart. As they pass Scarpia's room, Tosca enters and pleads for her lover's release. She frantically implores the hard- hearted man to save Mario, telling him in her desperation to name his price. Scarpia informs her, therefore, that he will free the condemned man if she promises to give him up and transfer her affec- tions to himself. Unable to stand the strain any longer, she signifies her consent, but bargains that her lover be freed immediately. Scarpia tells her that he cannot release a prisoner at once, but that he will change the death sentence from hanging to a military execution, giving orders that blank car- tridges shall be used. Scarpia writes out the order, but deceives Tosca, for, with a sinister glance to the waiting officer, he lets him understand that it is to be sure death. Tosca then demands a pass- port for herself and Mario, which is given her, and, as Scarpia comes toward her with open arms to receive his reward, he is met with a dagger which the woman sinks deep into his heart, and he falls to the floor, dead. Then lighting two candles, Tosca places them at his head, and, detaching a crucifix from the wall, places it on the breast of the corpse, and, undiscovered, she leaves the place.

The hour for the execution arrives, and Tosca assures Mario that all will be well and that he must feign death. Bravely the painter takes his place before the muskets and falls with the volley from the rifles. Tosca then rushes to her lover and bids him arise, but when he does not move she tears off the cloak, and there, to her horror, dis- covers that he is truly dead and that the execution has indeed been a real one. A moment later the officers appear and accuse her of the murder of Scarpia, whereupon she rushes to the edge of the parapet and flings herself down into the court. Length, 1,075 feet.

A WOMAN'S INTRIGUE.—An ambitious young man, who is not as fortunate in possessing the world's riches as his foster-brother, receives a let- ter from the latter asking him to call at his man- sion and meet his new sister-in-law. The lad, in his simple manner, goes to the home of his relatives and is graciously received. The hostess, in order to facilitate a pleasant visit for her guest, goes for a stroll with him through the magnificent estate. She, being very susceptible to the gentle manner of the youth, induces him to take a seat in a shady nook, where she attempts to manifest her true feel- ings for him, which is much stronger than a pla- tonic friendship. The young man is at a loss to realize the true state of affairs, and having a little country girl for a loving sweetheart, he does not forget his devotion to her in the hour of tempta- tion. When the woman's scheme does not work, she becomes enraged and denounces the youth for scorning her, whereupon the latter leaves the place immediately and returns to his own simple little home.

For revenge, the deceitful woman rushes toward the house and informs her husband that his brother insulted her, and the indignant man, believing his wife's story, goes to the innocent youth and de nounces him. The latter denies his guilt, but his word counts for nothing against a lady's. The old caretaker becomes suspicious and follows the woman one day to the home of the youth, where she goes again to try and win his affection; but the boy will have none of her and strongly denounces her for the terrible injustice which she had done him. The old man in hiding overhears everything and hastens to the woman's husband, whom he tells of the grave deception, and when his wife returns she is confronted with the lie, and in the presence of her accuser and the one whom she injured by her intrigue she is forced to admit her deception. Length, 476 feet.

SNAKESKIN INDUSTRY.—In this interesting pic- ture we get an idea of the magnitude of the snake industry in Java, where the serpents are captured by the natives and the skins utilized for commercial purposes, which is a very lucrative enterprise. After washing and tanning the skins are made into all sorts of beautiful and useful little objects, which are a rarity on account of their high prices. Length, 492 feet.

SKYLIGHT THEATER SEAT.—A funny old woman occupies a little flat next door to a theater and her windows directly overlook the skylight above the stage, affording her an excellent oppor- tunity to enjoy all the performances from her reserved seat in the widow. While going down the street one evening, she happens to meet a friend, another old woman as quaint and picturesque as herself, and realizing that the latter would enjoy a treat, informs her of the great privilege she has in possessing a skylight seat at a neighboring thea- ter. The generous old woman invites her friend to come over, which she gladly consents to do. That evening she puts in her appearance, and while waiting for the performance to begin the two old creatures have a little sociable drink, after which they climb out on the roof and place their chairs over the skylight, thus having an unobstructed view of the stage. The performance begins, and soon the audience is in an uproar of enthusiasm, while the two old women crane their necks in order to see all that is to be seen. At a very interest- ing part, when all are wrought up to a high pitch, the two old women become so interested that they lean too far over, and, losing their balance, they fall through the glass, landing on the stage directly in the midst of the performers, who are so sur- prised that they take flight, while the audience all make a bolt for the exits. Length, 289 feet.

RAPIDS AND FALLS OF TANNFOSSEN AND RISTA.—This is another one of our educational pic- tures which is sure to meet with the approval of all who are fond of travel, for herewith we are transported into Sweden and enjoy the natural beau- ties of that wondrous country and see at close range the beautiful rapids and falls and many other interesting parts shown in this interesting picture. Length, 390 feet.

HIS LUCKY DAY.—This extremely droll picture shows a fellow who is always broke, but who tries nevertheless to keep in the swim and ward off his many creditors, who never give him a moment's peace. One day he receives a note from his tailor saying he is coming around to collect. Hearing a noise at the door, the impecunious young man thinks the tailor has arrived, so conceals himself in a trunk. He is mistaken, however, for the visitor turns out to be a burglar, and just as the latter enters the room and is about to begin operations, the tailor comes in. In order, therefore, to avert suspicion the thief takes the bill and pays it. The lucky fellow in hiding is enjoying the situation and opens the door to allow more of his creditors to enter; each time the burglar repeats his noble act in order to keep out of trouble, and finally when all are satisfied the youth comes out from his hiding place, takes his goods from the unfortunate thief, gives him a good beating and throws him out of the place. Length, 295 feet.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

THE MOONSTONE.—The Taking of the Moon- stone.—This scene for artistic realism has never been surpassed. It transports the audience from the commonplace of this workaday world into the mystic pagan symbolism of India.

Six Months Later.—We travel with our character- ters to the great city of history and tradition, London, where we see the pleasure loving fiance of Herncastle with a party of friends at a game of baccarat.

On the Right Track.—Next we see the party of Hindoos at their suite of apartments in the Hotel Cecil.

Tracing the Stone by Hypnotism.—A daughter of one of the faithful is put into a hypnotic sleep and while in this condition describes the present location of the Moonstone. Herncastle is seen in the act of transferring the diamond to his fiance in a vision. Interest now centers on Herncastle's sweetheart, who places the diamond under her pil- low when she retires for the night. She is a som- nambulist, and the weighty responsibility of the "Moonstone's" care makes her restless; she rises in her sleep, takes the "Moonstone" from beneath her pillow and seeks a more secure hiding place. She mounts the stairs leading to the roof and there secretes the treasure beneath a loose brick in the chimney. Her maid, hearing a noise, follows her. On reaching the head of the stairs and seeing her mistress in a perilous position near the edge of the roof, she screams, waking her suddenly and causing her to stagger and fall -this tragedy depicting clearly the curse of the "Moonstone." In a room at Herncastle the master hears the awful fate of his fiance from a club friend. His next feeling is one of anxiety, fear for the loss of the stone. He goes to her apartment and remembering her fall from the roof he feels certain it is there that she secreted the stone. The Hindoo, with the same idea, is there before him and discovers the jewel just as Herncastle reaches the roof. A struggle follows and Herncastle recovers possession of the stone. He has recognized his antagonist and rushes from the scene in a mad endeavor to escape. The scene shifts to Hampton Roads, where a balloon ascension is in preparation. The owner of one of the balloons is a friend of Herncastle's, who comes into the scene closely followed by the Hindoo. Herncastle, maddened by pursuit, jumps into the balloon, cuts the rope and rises into space; believing himself free at last, he feverishly throws out ballast to make the balloon rise more rapidly. In his excitement he has not seen the Hindoo grasp the rope and commence a daring hand over hand climb in midair. He turns, still laughing exultantly over his effectual escape, to face his fate in the form of the Hindoo just stepping into the basket. For a second of time they look into each other's eyes, realizing it means life and fredom for only one of them; then, maddened by the desperation of their perilous position, they clinch. The occult power of justice prevails. Herncastle is overcome, the Hindoo secures the Moonstone and Herncastle falls from the balloon, a victim of his own cupidity.

Six Months Later.—In front of the Moon-God's sacred temple the prince assists a beautiful girl from the houdah of a magnificently caparisoned elephant. On the steps of the temple, awaiting the prince and his party, we recognize the faithful followers who accompanied him in his search for the recovery of the jewel.

Inside the Temple.—From the Moon-God's forehead blazes the great white diamond men call the Moonstone, and our story picture closes with a pagan ceremony of marriage, for it is thus the prince rewards the maiden through whose occult powers the stone was first traced.

A picture that exhibitors will be asked to show again and again by their patrons, in fact, a picture destined to live. Length, 1,000 feet.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

A FRIEND IN NEED IS A FRIEND INDEED.—A number of clerks are busily engaged in their duties as the manager, a grouchy individual, enters and observes that one young man is missing. Turning for a moment to the absent clerk's home, we find his wife dying. The young man is doing his best to gratify her wishes, glances at the clock at intervals, remains at home until the last possible moment, then rushes to the office. Arriving there behind his accustomed time, his fellow clerks ask the reason and are told of the trouble at home. He goes about his work listlessly, when suddenly the door opens and the maid servant enters, hands him a message to the effect that his wife is dead. The clerk shows the note to the manager, asks for a few days off, but the request is gruffly granted. His associates cast sympathetic glances as he goes, and, when one of the number proposes sending a floral piece, all contribute save the manager, who sulkily refuses. The clerks depart, and, when alone, the manager glances at his watch, starts to leave also, then changes his mind and begins to rummage through his desk. He presently finds what he is looking for—a faded photograph. He gazes at it a few moments, then his manner softens. He takes his check book, makes out a check for $50 and sends it with a letter of apology for his gruffness and also of sympathy for the clerk in his bereavement, to the home of the latter. Length, 552 feet.

MR. PHYSICAL CULTURE'S SURPRISE PARTY.—The picture opens in the home of Mr. Physical Culture, where, hanging about the room, on the floor and tables, are boxing gloves, pictures of pugilists, dumb-bells, Indian clubs, etc., showing the gentleman's athletic inclinations. His wife is reading a magazine, when he enters, tears off his sweater and starts exercising. The lady is plainly annoyed by her husband's actions, but cannot turn him away from his athletic tastes. The maid enters with a letter for her lady. It is from her sister, reminding her that it is Mr. Physical Culture's birthday anniversary and that she has arranged a surprise party for him. Wifey coaxes him into the bed-chamber, takes out his full-dress suit and begs him to put it on. Not knowing of the surprise party, and failing to see why he should don the "swallow tail," the gentleman politely refuses. The lady keeps up her coaxing, and, in order to get rid of her he finally consents. As she leaves the room he throws the dress suit contemptuously aside and puts on a track suit. While the Mrs. is down stairs straightening out her room in anticipation of the callers, hubby is in his room doing a Marathon. The guests presently arrive, and at once inquire for the husband. The hostess makes a gesture of despair and points to the floor above, asking if they wish to see her athletic mate. They signify their desire to do so, tiptoe upstairs, peek through the keyhole and over the transom, where Mr. Physical Culture is seen going through all sorts of stunts, stopping every few moments to pose before the mirror. The noise outside attracts his attention, and, believing that burglars are in his house, he grabs his revolver in one hand, an Indian club in the other and starts downstairs. The guests hear him coming, hide themselves and, when the gentleman enters, he is roughly seized and bounced into a chair. He is mortified at being caught in such a costume, begs his wife to bring his dress suit. She returns quickly with the same, which he grabs, then retires to his room to dress suitably for the occasion. Length, 417 feet.

A ROMANCE OF OLD MEXICO.—A beautiful Spanish girl is observed on the front porch watering the flowers. A typical gypsy woman passing by offers to tell the girl's fortune. She consents and the gypsy warns her that she will soon have a lover's quarrel. Shortly afterward her sweetheart arrives in the person of a Spanish bull fighter. She implores him for her sake not to attend a dance at one of the concert halls of questionable reputation. He swears that he will not go, kisses her good-bye and, vowing his eternal love, departs. The following scene shows the interior of a Spanish cafe, where young couples are dancing together, singing and having a general good time as the bull fighter arrives. A capricious young girl greets him, climbs upon the table and dances a Fandango. The bull fighter is at once infatuated, pays her all manner of attention until she in turn falls in love with him. They are discovered by the gypsy woman, who hastens to make the facts known to the young Spanish girl of our first scene. She goes to the dance hall, enters unnoticed and surprises her lover in another girl's arms. She immediately plans vengeance. Upon her way home she meets a young fellow who accosts her, suddenly recollects her sweetheart's infidelity, and encourages his advances. In proof of his devotion the young gallant promises to serenade her that evening, and after midnight we find him before the house fulfilling his promise. The young girl appears on the balcony, then descends to thank the young fellow for the serenade. The bull fighter has been attracted by the music, draws near to the house just as his rival is declaring his love for the girl. Seeing this the bull fighter is about to engage in conflict when the young girl explains that he is a new admirer whom she prefers to him. The bull fighter, downcast, returns to his apartment and attires himself in his best toreador costume for the fight in the arena. He is extremely sorrowful for his infidelity and kisses his lost sweetheart's picture as he departs. Several hours later the gypsy woman, who was one of the spectators at the bull fight, has observed the injury to the bull fighter, sends a message to the Spanish girl, who hastens to the arena hospital and finds her former lover badly injured. She becomes reconciled, and he promises eternal fidelity in case of recovery. Length, 530 feet.

CAUGHT AT LAST.—A gentleman is lounging in his easy chair smoking and reading the paper. His little boy Willie, brimful of mischief, is tormenting little sister until father reprimands him and makes him sit quietly to one side of the room. The little fellow picks up a paper and sees a headline, "Circumstantial Evidence." This is Greek to Willie, and he asks his father to explain. The parent immediately does so, while the child nods his head that he understands, then leaves the room bent on putting "circumstantial evidence" to a test. He goes to the kitchen, where his mother is baking cake. He asks her for some milk, is given a little in a glass, asks for more and is refused. When mother leaves the room Willie almost drains the bottle, pours a little on the table, places the cat nearby and goes out. Outside Bridget is beating carpet. Willies pulls out a few hairs, and, while papa is looking aside, puts them on his shoulder. He then hunts up mother and tells her of the hairs on his father's shoulder. A family argument takes place and Willie is satisfied. He then goes out on the back porch, where his mother has just put some freshly baked pies out to cool off. Willie makes away with them, calls the dog, smears a little pie over its mouth and feet and runs away. The mother meanwhile is weeping bitterly from what she thinks unfaithfulness on the part of the husband while he is doing his best to console her. Bridget enters at this moment and angrily tells how Willie pulled out her hair. Light dawns on father and mother, and as Willie enters, he is justly blamed for all the trouble and punished accordingly. Length, 440 feet.

CAB NO. 519.—From Sherlock Holmes' memoirs.—Mr. B. is alone with his friend H. when he receives a letter which informs him that his uncle is dead and has left him £200,000. He is very happy over this good news and his friend seems to take part in his joy, but he quietly makes up his mind to take his friend's place and get hold of the money in due course.

H. makes haste to secure an assistant, and old John Smith promises to get B. out of the way for a considerable share of the spoil.

B. wants to get off the same evening, but H. persuades him to buy a new portmanteau before leaving, and as soon as B. has gone to a leather-seller's shop, H. hurries to his assistants and begs them to act quickly.

As B. comes out of the shop, a cab passes slowly by as if by accident. He calls to the driver, gets in and leans back very joyfully, but immediately he feels a sweet smell and falls back unconscious. The cab stops in front of John Smith's house. B. is carried in, and a moment later H. is in possession of the papers.

When B. left the leather-seller's shop he left his pocketbook on the counter by accident. This small circumstance is the cause of his life being saved. The leather-seller finds the forgotten pocketbook, takes it and runs out just in time to see B. drive away and to notice the number of the cab: 519.

The next morning he takes the pocketbook to B.'s house, and when he learns that B. has not yet come home he understands that a crime has been committed and goes at once to Sherlock Holmes. The only clue in the case is the number of the cab, but this is quite sufficient to the intelligent detective. In less than an hour the cab is found and Sherlock Holmes is on the box of the cab dressed as a driver. Thus the detective instead of the criminal cabman fetches B. and drives him to the steamer, where the young man is taken senseless on board.

The ship is now in open sea, as Smith, who has played the part of warden to a poor young gentleman, who is insane, comes out from his cabin, carrying B., who is still senseless; but as the criminal is about to throw the helpless young man overboard, he is seized by two strong men and thrown down on the deck. The sailors appear and carry Smith away to put him under lock and key, while Sherlock Holmes himself carries B. into his cabin.

Now Sherlock Holmes has yet to unveil the false friend. He is caught and confronted with his assistants and victim just as he is at the solicitor's office, about to receive all the money. He tries to escape punishment by killing himself, but is at the last moment prevented by Sherlock Holmes, and committed to prison.

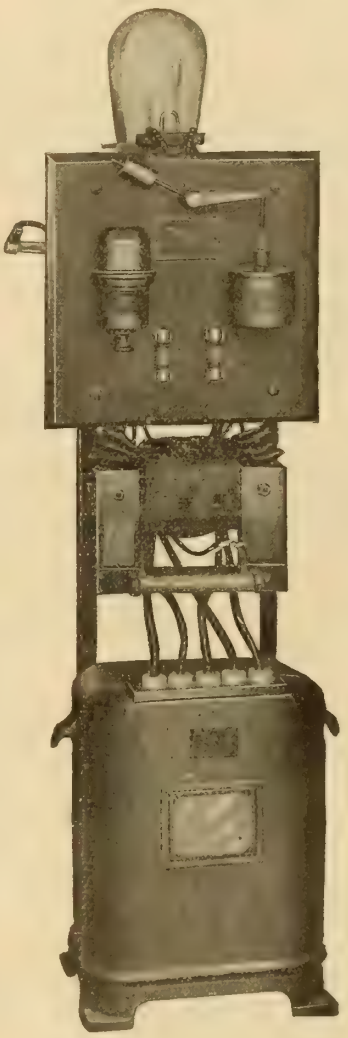
You can if you buy a GENERAL ELECTRIC MERCURY ARC RECTIFIER for your Moving Picture Theatre instead of rheostats or choke coils.

The Rectifier will take alternating current from the supply circuit and change it to direct current at just the right voltage for the arc. With the Rectifier you do not have any trouble with red-hot rheostats, your incandescent lights do not flicker when you start your arc, and you are not troubled with spots and "ghosts" on the screen. The entire outfit operates smoothly, safely and satisfactorily. Your patrons will be better satisfied because the pictures are better. You will be better satisfied because you are actually saving money. Assume that you operate your lamp 6 hours per day, and that you pay 10c. per kw. hour.



A glance at the following operating costs will show just exactly how much you can save in a year.

Direct Current and Rheostat, 26 amps. on the arc.	$515.00
Alternating Current and Rectifier, 26 amps on the arc	375.00
Saved in one year	$140.00

WARNING TO EXHIBITORS

DO not be intimidated by the latest trust circular, this time in the form of a letter, issued by a firm of attorneys to give it the semblance of legality. The trust must issue a circular every month in an endeavor to force the exhibitors to submit to its dictates, which up to the present time it has found impossible. The trusts knows full well that it dare not interfere with International Projecting & Producing Co. film, and exhibitors and exhanges need have no fear as far as our film is concerned. To those handling other film we cannot guarantee protection, but we will legally defend an interference with International Projecting & Producing Co. film.

Advise us promptly if any attempt is made by trust agents to intimidate users of OUR GOODS in any way.

We only use their film for our very cheapest service, and if you can use them and will write us, we will rent you Six reels a week for $20.00, and allow you to sub-rent to one other exhibitor and allow you to earn whatever you can get; also will allow you one-half of rentals on all extra customers you get in addition to the first one. Mr. Exhibitor:

You will receive a letter directed to you by a firm of New York lawyers representing the Motion Picture Patents Co., commonly known as the Trust, suggesting that you are liable to become a party to an infringement Action and Injunction Proceedings.

Our inference is that they are in desperation endeavoring to force you into patronizing the so-called Film Trust and fearing that any of the exhibitors using Independent film or prospective users of Independent film are liable to be intimidated by such tactics, we have organized a NATIONAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION and have retained the services of the best legal talent available. The object of this Association is not only to defend and to protect all of its members, but likewise extend its good offices and legal services without charge to any user of Independent film patronizing its members.

We are confident that a concerted action at this time will call this latest bluff of the so-called Film Trust and put a stop to its harassing methods. We will not only be able to protect the interests of members and exhibitors using Independent film, but we invite definite action against us or any of our members by the Trust. This is to be a National body and we invite the legitimate Independent Film Exchanges to become members. A call for a National Convention will be issued in the near future.

Whether you decide to become a member or to act independently of it, our Secretary will, at all times, be pleased to furnish exchanges and moving picture exhibitors with any information they may desire in connection with this movement.

We request the Independent Exhibitors who may be annoyed in any manner by the Trust representatives to get in connection immediately with our Temporary Secretary providing him with full details.

I don't blame those exhibitors who were inclined to worry a little because they received threatening letters from the film trust last week. I will confess that I was fooled myself for a short time, but it didn't take long to uncover the game. The full force of the monumental bluff revealed itself when I found that these letters were not only sent to exhibitors who are using independent films, BUT ALSO TO USERS OF LICENSED FILMS AS WELL! In other words they are threatening their own customers in a roundabout manner, trying to make them believe that if they ever do quit using licensed films, they will be drawn, quartered and made into human hash. This is only another instance of the blundering methods of the worst managed trust in all America. I have some respect for a good bluffer. I have some respect for a smooth liar. But I have infinite contempt for any man who tries to make a bluff and hasn't brains enough to carry it through. This last effort of the worst managed trust in America is proof enough that we have got them on the run. If I did not know just where we stand, do you suppose I would have announced last week that I am going to become a film manufacturer as well as a renter? Do you think I would invest thousands of dollars in a film manufacturing game if I did not KNOW POSITIVELY AND CERTAINLY THAT THE INDEPENDENT MOVEMENT IS AS SAFE AS GOVERNMENT BONDS? Get into the Laemmle band wagon in time for the next big release of new independent subjects and see how it feels to breathe free air again! By the way have you paid $2 for a license to kiss your wife this week?

The Foundling

A Dressing Room Waif

Ruth Hodgson leaves home to marry against her fathers wishes. Left with a tiny baby girl she appeals to her father to forgive her and take her home. He refuses and casts her out with her child to starve or beg. She wanders around aimlessly, finally leaves the baby in the dressing room of a theatre where it is found and adopted by John Redmund, an actor. Ruth goes on the stage and some years later joins the same company with Redmund. Mother and daughter are reunited and Ruth eventually marries Redmund. Length, 1,000 feet.

The Son's Return

Almost fatal result of his arriving incognito

The son of a rural boniface leaves home to fight for fortune. Arriving in the metropolis he secures a position in a banking house. By dint of assiduity he attains in time a standing of importance and financial ease. When he left home he declared he would not return until he had made a name for himself; but in the meantime his parents have fallen into sore straights and their little inn is in danger of being sold over their heads. Pride forces them to keep this condition from the boy, and his sweetheart sends him the sad news. To surprise them he conceals his identity, having grown a beard, and when the old folks see the roll of money he has on him, their poverty makes them unconscionable and they almost effect the murder of their own unknown son.

"Hunted to the End"

Drama. Approximate Length, 717 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, JUNE 15, 1909.

On the terrace of a cafe a braggard boasts of his adventures to a number of his companions. A journalist in passing accidentally touches the central figure in the group and thus provokes a quarrel which results in a challenge to a duel.

The next day the seconds sorrowfully report the result of the encounter and the woman's grief knows no bounds as she learns she is a widow. A friend of the family vows vengeance and at every opportunity he confronts the slayer of his friend and ultimately causes his arrest and conviction.

"A Paying Business"

Comedy. Approximate Length, 285 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, JUNE 15, 1909.

A CLEAN COMEDY WITH A CLEVER CRITICISM ON THE VANITY OF MANKIND.

A professional beggar, who has imposed upon the public by pretending to be blind, finds his income is decreasing to a very great degree, and, in search of some plan by which to enlarge his receipts, he and a companion purchase an old photographic outfit, which they carry to the beggar's old stand on the public square.

Here the beggar kneels in his usual attitude of asking aid, holding his hat extended for coins. His companion impersonates a photographer, placing his camera in such a position as to make it appear he is taking a picture of the beggar in his sad plight.

People who would ordinarily pass with no thought of charity, seeing what they believe an opportunity of having themselves photographed in the act of giving alms, contribute very liberally.

After gathering a very considerable harvest, the accomplices leave arm-in-arm, rejoicing. Well rendered and excellent quality.

"The Cry from the Well"

Dramatic. Approximate Length, 812 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1909.

A young carpenter falls in love with a charming gypsy girl and seeks her hand. The poor fellow has had a sad existence with his little sister, who was of melancholic disposition.

Married life, he hopes, will bring happiness to his home and also be a blessing to the unfortunate sister. Things run on smoothly for a time, but soon the wife becomes tired of the care of the litle girl and conceives a desire to spirit her away. The sweet melodies of an accordion in the hands of the woman lure the girl on to the ledge of a well and the inevitable accident occurs.

Later the brother seeks, but fails to find, his sister, and upon retiring he has a vision of the sad catastrophe befallen her. He forces his wife to accompany him to the well and there learns the truth of the disappearance of the poor unfortunate girl.

"The New Footman"

Comedy. Approximate Length, 569 feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 16, 1909.

A HIGHLY AMUSING AND WELL-RENDERED STORY OF WINNING A WIFE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The suitor for the hand of the general's daughter does not receive encouragement from the object of his love and resolves to win by strategy. Learning through an advertisement that the general is in need of a butler, preferably a negro, he has his beard cut and a coat of black applied to his white skin, and with the conventional garb of a professional he applies. Together with another applicant (white) he is taken on probation. An anonymous letter to the general advises that a daring plot is to be executed to win his daughter and his suspicions immediately rest upon his new servants.

The colored servant is exceptionally good and the other so awkward as to cause much trouble, and even precipitates a quarrel with the master, from which the latter is rescued by the colored servant. In the mix-up, however, the general acquires some of his servant's coloring and the entire party makes a woe-begone sight. The lover is recognized and his cleverness so appeals to his sweetheart that he is accepted.

"Modern Algeria"

Travelogue. Approximate Length, 396 feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 16, 1909.

In the Oasis of Zibans, Algeria, a delightful series of views, bringing before the public eye one of the most beautiful spots of the Eastern continent.

Wanted: A New F. S. A.

THIRD ARTICLE.

Our articles of April 17 and May 1, under the above heading, have borne fruit. There is considerable activity in the organizing field. In other words, the new F. S. A. which we pleaded for seems about to take shape. To begin with, the old F. S. A. announces its convention for Atlantic City, on July 16, 17 and 18. The exact nature of the business that will be before this body is not known, but we believe it will be decided there or beforehand whether the membership shall consist of licensed exchanges only, or of a mixture of licensed and Independent. Upon the decision of this point the future of the old F. S. A. will, of course, depend. The next step towards the formation of our ideal Film Service Association was taken last week in Chicago. In the World for June 5 we remarked as follows:

"Another Film Renters' Protective Association has been formed—this time in Chicago. Let us hope that its sphere of usefulness will be broader and its existence more harmonious than any of its predecessors. As we go to press we have only the names of the large Chicago independent renters as associated with the movement. No doubt it is intended to make the association national in scope. Conducted on broad lines, inviting a full attendance of manufacturers, renters and leading exhibitors, a national conference would be a great benefit to the trade at present."

We concluded the second of the before mentioned articles in the following words:

"We look upon the renter as the most important factor in the film situation at the present time. It is he who should control the output, regulate prices, suppress duping, prevent price cutting, eliminate undesirable theaters, limit the number, look after the legislatures in their dealings with the moving picture industry, and generally take a constant and active interest in everything affecting the progress of the moving picture industry. These matters should be left neither to an extraneous company, a few manufacturers, or to widely scattered exhibitors. They should be in the hands of a strong and authoritative film service association representative of renters all over the country and officered by powerful and level-headed business men. Now who will take the formation of this association in hand? Swanson, Miles, Laemmle, Lieber, it is up to you. The eye of America is upon you and you are looked to to give the moving picture field an association, active, strong, militant and progressive, worthy of the name. Will you do it?"

Evidently, then, all the men to whom we so pointedly appealed have got busy and the result is seen in the existence of two film renters' associations, each fighting under different banners. In the immediate future much work remains for these associations to do in looking after the interests of their members. The old F. S. A., so far as we can gather, has little or no programme. The new association, however, certainly starts out with a definite object in view. That object is the protection of its members against anticipated infringement actions and injunction proceedings. So far, then, the situation seems pretty clear. But, it will be asked, is there really room for two associations? Do not all the needs of the time point to the necessity for one great Film Renters' Association, which shall be truly national in scope? Can the two associations work in harmony or are they to be necessarily antagonistic? What is to be the outcome of these latest movements on the board?

The Moving Picture World, as we have pointed out over and over again, stands for the best in moving pictures, without fear or favor. Consequently it is our policy to support any movement which seems calculated to promote that end. The interests of renters throughout the country are or should be identical, therefore, common sense demands they should unite for the preservation of those interests. "United we stand, divided we fall."

The new Independent Film Renters' Association certainly makes a good start; it is well officered and well supported, and its progress will be watched with interest. Meanwhile, what of the exhibitors? They, too, are not very well organized. They might take a lesson from what the renters are doing and combine for purposes of mutual protection. It is true they are doing so in various States, but there is no national organization. There is certainly room for one. As we pointed out on May 8, there are three great interests to be conserved. The manufacturers, the renters and the exhibitors. The first group can very well take care of themselves. The second is less able to do so, and the third even less. That defines the exact position. The second body, however, is showing signs of activity in its own interest which should induce number three to follow suit.

A careful study of the situation in the moving picture field, convinces us that in the long run the present unsettled state of affairs will prove an ultimate advantage. The industry as a whole will benefit; it will settle down as a definite factor in the commercial scheme of things. We can plainly see the time ahead when there will be neither Trust nor Independent, but an industry well organized on broad, equitable and profitable lines, when the manufacturer, the renter and the exhibitor will be able to trade satisfactorily and logically in films and the public will have an excellent qualitative market to choose from. That time is not yet, however. The industry is straightening itself out. It must do so, and it is bound to do so. In a sense the new Film Renters' Protective Association is a valuable factor in assisting this forward movement. A combination between it and the old F. S. A. is by no means an improbability. A working agreement between the associated manufacturers, the International Company and other Independent importers and manufacturers is also not improbable; at any rate it is well within the sphere of practicability. It will only be by some such agency that the worst feature of all of the present crisis, namely, price cutting, will be prevented. For price cutting and under selling are real evils at this moment on both sides. That sort of thing cannot last indefinitely, if the film business is to be a money making one. It is the duty of the old F. S. A. and the new F. P. A. to handle this matter, and we hope they will do so at their forthcoming meetings.

Fooling the Public.

"You can fool some of the people some of the time, but not all of the people all the time." For the word "people" in this condensation of Lincoln's famous saying, read the word "public." Time after time we have pointed out that the real film battle is one of quality, that the public, the last court of appeal, has the decisive voice in this matter. We have said, until we are almost tired of seeing the words in print, that so long as you give the public good pictures they will go to see them. But when you start giving them bad ones, they will stay severely away. This is one of the laws of supply and demand which admits of no discussion.

"Quality! Quality!! Mr. Manufacturer!" we have cried, and to do him credit the manufacturer recognizes that we have taken up the right standpoint in this matter. A little while ago there was a distinct spurt in the quality of the films shown. Their photographic, dramatic and scenic properties were the theme of general admiration. Then all of a sudden a distinct set-back is apparent. Why is this? Why is it, in short, to take one instance which occurs, that the unities of the drama are flouted by both Independent and Licensed manufacturers alike? Do they think the public is really indifferent to these points? Do they so under-rate the average of intelligence of moving picture audiences as to be indifferent to glaring absurdities in their pictures? Let us illustrate what we mean.

We have been cognizant for some time past that moving pictures purporting to be representations of life in the Far West have been made in the peaceful surroundings of New Jersey and suburban New York. We pointed out this fact to individual manufacturers. We urged that they were bringing about their own undoing. Our remonstrances fell on deaf ears. What has been the result? Exhibitor after exhibitor is refusing their films. We were not alone in making the discovery that the public would not stand for the representation of dramatic action against obviously wrong scenery. In other words, we saw that the incongruity of showing a Texan adventure played by half-trained Broadway actors against a suburban background would surely provoke derision. So it has, and so it will. To emphasize our point we abstract from the pages of the New York Dramatic Mirror the following two criticisms of recent films:

INDEPENDENT.

"This picture was looked forward to with considerable interest, as it was strongly advertised and the independent field has felt great need of American productions. Unfortunately, the picture has proven a great disappointment. The photography is very poor, the story, or such of it as can be understood, is childish and the acting is of the cheapest melodramatic character. To make it worse, many scenes are dragged out to interminable lengths and the backgrounds purporting to show scenes in the Far West are located somewhere around New York, entirely destroying any illusion of reality. In one particular alone, the picture has merit and that is in the quality of some of the horseback riding. The cowboy lover of the 'flirt' kills a man in a card game and the girl succeeds in helping him to escape from prison. Further than that we despair describing the plot. It is to be hoped that other issues by the same company will prove more satisfactory. This sort of films will never put the licensed product out of business."

LICENSED.

"If the ——— Company would only recognize the futility of attempting to produce wild Western drama in Pennsylvania or New Jersey farming country, it would remove one of the most frequent grounds for criticism of ———'s pictures. Cowboys, Indians and Mexicans must be seen in proper scenic backgrounds to convey any impression of reality, and these backgrounds are extremely difficult to find in the East. Thus handicapped, this story, which is of puerile construction at the best, is of little account, excepting in the excellent riding of some of the people. A girl on a visit to her uncle, an Arizona ranchman, falls in love with a cowboy. The uncle discharges the cowboy and determines to ship the girl back home, but Mexicans, who appear to exist in this class of films, solely to make trouble, waylay the uncle, the girl and her brother. The discharged cowboy now has his opportunity, and he heads a successful rescue party, thereby winning the girl for his own."

Surely the persons responsible for the making of moving pictures will no longer commit these errors, which, if persisted in, are bound to work disastrously for the business. Some manufacturers have openly boasted to us that they do not visit moving picture theaters. For their own pockets' sake, we wish they would. It would do them good to hear the comments of intelligent spectators on the absurdities, incongruities and anachronisms of many of the pictures, which according to the very latest announcement are "the highest type of pictures in the world." We would much rather be writing articles of a different nature, but we feel that it is our duty to once more specifically call the attention of the manufacturers and their employees to the urgent need for producing moving pictures strictly according to formulæ which have been printed in these pages these last few months. But if they do not, if they will persist in turning out patchwork of the kind animadverted upon in the critiques quoted, then they and the business are bound to suffer.

There still appears to be a lot of old junk on the film market. Exchanges are loading up exhibitors with worn out pictures, instead of ordering new ones from the manufacturers. Some of the Independent manufacturers and importers are complaining of this state of affairs. They argue that it is the duty of the exchange man to support them. They also point out that if the exchange man fails in this respect, the business as a whole is bound to suffer. This is quite true. We are aware that the events of the last five months brought out a heap of rubbish which has been put into business. It is about time it was called in or destroyed, so that the business may proceed on legitimate lines.

There is an old-fashioned rule in newspaper offices which is that no notice is taken of anonymous contributions. Will the author of the typewritten document headed "To Those Who are Suffering from the Powerful and Almighty Blood-thirsty Embraces of the Film Trust" please note this? Other persons who also waste their time and labor on anonymous communications should also take notice of the fact. Our pages are open to any reasonable expression of opinion, if they are either signed or authenticated by the authors of them. A man who dare not fight in the open is beneath notice and, besides, we are old birds and not to be caught by chaff.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

CHAPTER XIII.

Moving Pictures in the Home.

In the preceding chapter I pointed out the uses which the moving picture camera can be put to in amateur hands. One of these days the amateur motographer may be as common in the land as the amateur photographer, and there is no reason why he should not be, for the trouble of making short lengths of moving pictures is not very much greater than that of a number of lantern slides. It all depends upon the enterprise of manufacturers. If they will supply the camera and other necessaries, I am confident they will find a ready market.

Indeed, the part which the moving picture is destined to play in the home is probably a very important one. It has done so before, and there is no reason why it should not do so again. We have already had the Mutoscope and the Kinora, the moving picture book and other obvious modification of the underlying principle of moving picture making, namely the presentation to the eye of a rapidly shown series of pictures of moving objects taken from a fixed standpoint. A little reflection shows that this can be applied to flexible film, to paper cardboard and other supports, and, as has been pointed out, in the cycloramic or book form.

There is one development of the idea to which reference is often made both in print and by word of mouth, namely the production of portrait photographs by moving pictures. In other words the use in a photographer's studio of a moving picture camera for making "living" instead of still portraits or groups. From time to time I hear that this is being done in Paris. I don't know whether this is so or not; at any rate, it is well worthy of practical trial.

I have had by me for some time the translation of a short article, which describes the method of carrying this out. I here append it, as it will probably be of interest to many who desire to experiment with the subject:

"We all know how difficult it is to seize the true expression of the face, that which gives the characteristics of the subject. Generally one is photographed in a formal pose, with a forced smile, which betrays the sensation of uneasiness felt on hearing the traditional 'Don't move!' A wooden expression, which is rarely lifelike, appears on the face. Therefore when you examine a score of portraits, especially of ladies, you will hardly find two that are satisfactory to the subjects; they generally think their friends' photographs successful, but never their own. In fact, when we consider a friend's face, it is not a single expression that we see, but a series of expressions which succeed each other rapidly and are blended by the eye as the photographic objective can not do; and it is this series of expressions that gives us the real physiognomy.

"The thing to do is evidently to take a cinematographic portrait, which will be still more clear if we add the stereoscopic relief. In order to effect this, Mr. Reynaud has designed a new praxinoscope in which the successive images, taken from points of view sufficiently removed to satisfy the laws of stereoscopy, are placed respectively at right and at left, in the interior of two dish-like receptacles turning together about a horizontal axis. Plane mirrors are placed at the center, as in the original praxinoscope, but with a new arrangement, which, by displacing the images sidewise, enables the observer to view them under normal conditions with the aid of a pair of stereoscopic prisms. They may also be projected on a screen by replacing these prisms with two object lenses. Moreover, the two series of images are so arranged that they are presented successively to the eyes without any cessation of continuous vision in the case of either eye. This disposition has the advantage of doubling the number of poses from the cinematographic point of view.

"In its practical form the 'stereo-cinema' has all the essential parts already indicated; they are supported by a leg, and the axis on which the dish-shaped wheels revolve is set in motion by hand, by means of a crank. A special support, of variable height, carries the eyepiece, and, by means of a sliding-piece and a screw, may be placed at any desired distance.

"Mr. Reynaud makes his negatives himself, either at his studio or at the subject's home, and prints his positives on bands of paper that fit easily into the wheels. The device is then turned toward the window or toward a lamp, to light the pictures well, and the crank is turned, whereupon the observer sees before him a living and moving image of the person represented."

The idea is feasible and practicable. Many of my older readers will remember the cabinet stereoscope in which one viewed either paper slides or glass transparencies. Something of this kind would be wanted for the moving end of the moving picture portrait. The cabinet stereoscope is still marketed and seen, although it is a bit out of date. Nevertheless it was once an ornament in the home which always interested visitors of the domestic circle, and delighted permanent residents of it. The adaptation of moving pictures to some such system as this would not be a difficult matter. All that is needed is sufficient enterprise on the part of clever manufacturers to make the moving picture portrait cabinet as prominent a feature in American homes to-day as the cabinet stereoscope was years ago.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER VII

RHEOSTATS.

In the matter of rheostats their design is almost legion, but the really good ones are limited. The writer would like to personally recommend a few he has found to be strictly first class, but in a work of this sort it is manifestly impossible. Moreover he has not tried or even seen all kinds and might do an injustice to some excellent machines with which he is not acquainted. In view of this circumstance he has concluded to confine his remarks largely to the rheostats sent out with and as a part of machine outfits.

In setting up your rheostat be sure to insulate it thoroughly. True, the coils are insulated from the frame, but this insulation is not always to be relied upon. A coil may weaken and swing out against the casing or other things may happen to produce the same effect. If the casing itself is not insulated this will mean serious current loss unless the "ground" be heavy enough to burn itself out, blow a fuse or otherwise evidence its existence. Set your rheostats on heavy asbestos board, slabs of marble, slate, glass or other non-combustible insulating material. If they be placed near a wall other than stone, brick or tile protect the wall with sheet asbestos with air space of one inch back of it. Never set rheostats near anything inflammable, as they are liable to become very hot, especially if overloaded—as rheostats too often are. Be sure to connect your wires tightly, setting the binding-post screws down with plyers. Don't overdo this, however, and twist the screws off. Use a little judgment and common sense. Don't let the plyers slip and "bugger" the screw tops up—that is an evidence of carelessness and sloppiness. Clean the wire thoroughly before inserting it in the post. A dirty connection is almost as bad as a loose one. If the wire is too small for the post (and most rheostats have binding-posts with too small a hole in them—manufacturers take notice) use a copper terminal, cut of which will be shown later. If the wires of the rheostat show red the machine is overloaded. If the coils are all in and show red the machine is too small for the work and you should install a larger one. If not all in cut them in and add another rheostat in multiple. It is very, very poor economy to overload a rheostat. It won't last very long with that sort of usage and will waste much current through excessive heating while it does last.

When using an adjustable rheostat with sliding contacts keep the contacts clean and see to it that the contact is tight, otherwise they will quickly become roughened by almost invisible arcing. Should this happen, remove the lever and carefully, with a fine file, smooth up the contacts and face of lever contact and fix the latter so that it will make firm connection with the contacts. Remember this: a poorly constructed rheostat is the most expensive article you can buy. By all means get a good machine. It will save you money every hour you run if you are on metered service. For motion picture work it is best to get one with which more current than is normally used may be cut in by the operator. You will occasionally get a very dense film and if the operator is able to increase his current strength in such cases it is a great help. Unless required by local law the rheostat should not be located in the operating room in Summer unless there is a hood over them connecting with a vent pipe to carry off the heat. They may be placed in a dry basement, being very sure that they are thoroughly insulated from the ground and protected from contact with anything inflammable. In Winter one rheostat may be placed in the ticket office, where it furnishes heat without extra bother or expense. Unless for mere temporary use the best rheostat is always the cheapest in the long run. A poorly constructed one is an abomination and makes for heavy current bills and poor light. Without good light you won't have a good show and without a good show the nickels will—well, if you don't know what they will do, experience (the fool's only teacher) will demonstrate the matter in course of time. Some rheostats are made with cast metal resistance instead of wire coils. The writer has had no actual experience with this type of resistance, but sees no reason why it should not be all right if made of proper alloy. Possibly it might even be some better on alternating current, since it ought not to have the vibration so frequently present in wire coil machines when used on alternating. These machines are, however, considerably heavier (some I have seen are excessive in weight) than the wire coil rheostats and this is very objectionable in road work. In purchasing a rheostat see to it that the machine complies fully with requirements of local law; that its coils are well separated, well insulated, well fastened to the insulators and are not loose and "flabby." See to it that the binding posts will accommodate wires the size you propose to use—and that should be No. 6 if used on motion picture lamp. If adjustable, with sliding contact, see to it that the contacts are ample in size and that the contact is such that it can be kept tight—this latter is of the utmost importance. Don't look at the price half as closely as you do the machine. With direct current the writer prefers connecting the rheostats on the negative wire, since this gives a somewhat lower voltage at the lamp. The effect will be the same whichever wire the resistance is on, but if you get a "jolt" (electricians' name for shock) it won't be quite so heavy. With alternating either wire is the same. How to determine which is the positive and which the negative wire will be fully explained later on. The rheostat cuts the voltage down somewhat since resistance always causes drop in voltage. The more resistance the greater the "drop." The arc itself is supposed to cause a drop of 40 volts through internal resistance. Owing to this resistance an arc cannot be sprung (started) with less than 40 volts pressure.

Fig. 20 shows the 25 ampere, adjustable rheostat put out with the Powers machine. This rheostat is well made, but does not comply with Underwriters' requirements in that it has no casing. It supplies a maximum of 25 amperes on 110 volts direct or 104 volts alternating. On the left is one binding-post to which one of the wires must always be attached. This post connects directly with the adjustment lever. The adjustment cuts out or in one coil for each contact. On the right are two binding posts. When the wire is attached to the inner one, two of the coils are dead and with all resistance cut in eight coils are working. With wire attached to outer post all ten coils are working when all resistance is cut in. The inner coil is only useful when working on very low pressure current. The Powers people also put out with their machines a rheostat identical with the above except that it is non-adjustable and has casing, thus complying with Underwriters' rules.

Let me say here that when using an adjustable rheostat on which appear the words "in" and "out" on opposite sides of the contacts, swinging the lever, or knob, towards the "in" cuts in more resistance and reduces the current. Swinging toward the "out" has, of course, the opposite effect. Before turning current on an adjustable rheostat for the first time, set the adjustment clear around to "in," then close switch and move the lever until you get the current you want.

Fig. 21 shows two other rheostats put out with Powers machines. The smaller is well made and has a maximum capacity of 35 amperes on voltage ranging up to 120. The construction is first class, the contacts excellent and the adjustment arrangement very convenient. There are but two binding posts. Attach a wire to each is all the instruction necessary, setting the lever so that the resistance is all in before turning on current, of course. The larger machine may be used on voltage from 52 to 240. It is exceptionally well made and is quite light. The writer has found it par-excellent for road work. There are two binding-posts, one of which connects, of course, directly with the central adjustment lever post, and the other with the end of the coil opposite the post. On this machine by side of a binding post appears "in 52" with an arrow, meaning that for 52 volts the lever should be in this position and moved in direction of arrow to cut in resistance. Be very sure not to turn on current when the lever is against the stop post on this side, as then the resistance is all out and it would be a dead short circuit when the lamp carbons were closed and there would be fireworks and blown fuses. For 52 volts set the lever back about five points before turning on current and then move it to suit. From the contact beside "in 52" the coils connect straight around the machine and the further you move the lever the more resistance you have. For 110 volts set the lever around about seven contacts, turn on current and move to suit. For 220 volts set lever clear around against stop post, opposite the "240" and move back to suit. This machine is divided into two halves which may be used singly, in series or in multiple. As the machine reaches you the two halves are connected in series by a wire jumper between the eighth and ninth contacts. To use the two halves separately on different lamps remove the jumper, set the lever against post on the 220 side. Connect one set of wires to the "in 52" binding post and to the eighth contact and the other set to the other post and the ninth contact. The last named half will be adjustable but not the other. To use in multiple remove the jumper, set lever against stop post on the "220 out" side. Connect one wire to both binding posts and the other to both the eighth and ninth contacts. The "220 out" side will be adjustable but not the other. There are eight coils on one side and six on the other but the wire is different gauge so that the resistance of the two sides is essentially the same. With the two contacts inside the circle you need not concern yourself. At that point two coils are cut in or out instead of one, though for what reason the writer himself is unable to understand.

Fig. 22 shows the very flexible rheostat put out by the Viascope Company (Chicago) with the Viascope machine. On 110 volts one may get 10, 20, 25, 30, 35 or 40 amperes by manipulating three switches—an excellent arrangement for the operator. The machine complies with Underwriters' rules and may be used on any voltage from 52 to 220. The resistance wire in this machine is all in one piece, which is an advantage in some ways but makes it difficult to replace coils, should such an operation be necessary. The coils are in two rows, the rows joining at binding-post 1. By connecting one wire to post 2 and the other to post 3 the two sides are in series (switch 4 being open, of course). When using the machine thus be very sure that switch 4 cannot be closed, as that would cut out all resistance, making a dead short circuit. By connecting at posts 1 and 2 or 1 and 3, with switch 4 open, you use one side singly, the other being idle. Close switch 4 and the two sides are in multiple. Switch B cuts in five additional amperes when in lug 4 or ten amperes when in lug 5. Switch C in lug 6 adds 15 amperes, in lug 7 it adds 20 amperes.

Fig. 23 shows the two excellent rheostats put out with the Edison machines. The smaller is an adjustable, climax wire coil machine, each coil being independent and quickly removed by loosening two set screws. The coils, terminals, contacts, etc., are well insulated. The machine supplies a maximum of 25 amperes on 110 to 125 volt direct current.

May be used on alternating also. The contacts are good and the machine in every way well made, complying with Underwriters' requirements. There are but two binding posts. Attach a wire to each, set the lever to "in," turn on current and adjust to suit. The larger machine is of the cast metal gird type and the company claims for it great excellence. It gives a maximum of 40 amperes on 100 to 125 volt current. It is adjustable, with excellent contacts inside the casing and therefore well protected. The girds are well insulated. The top and bottom is covered with perforated, and the back, front and sides with solid sheet metal. No instructions are necessary. Connect the wire to either binding-post, set the knob around to "in," turn on current and adjust to suit.

The makers of the Motiograph machine put out three rheostats with their machine. The writer has, at the request of that company, very carefully examined these machines and in justice must say that they certainly are very finely constructed machines. All comply fully with Underwriters' rules. Their "A C R Dandy" is similar to the "Universal" (Fig. 24), but non-adjustable and but 25 amperes capacity on 110 volt pressure, either direct or alternating. It has but two binding posts. Attach a wire to each. Fig. 24 shows the "Universal," which has a capacity of 45 amperes. It is in effect two separate rheostats in one case. The two cells may be used singly, in series or in multiple. By different connections you may get, on 110 volt pressure, 12, 25 or 45 amperes. There are four binding-posts located on bottom of machine. There is one cell in each end of the machine and the two binding-posts opposite each other across (the thin way) the machine belong to the same cell. By attaching your wires to either of these two sets of posts you will be using one cell singly and get a little less than 25 amperes. By attaching one wire to both posts on one side the long way of the machine and the other wire to the other two posts the two cells will be in multiple and you will draw 45 amperes. By attaching one wire to either of the four posts and the other wire to the post at opposite diagonal corner and connecting the other two posts with a jumper (piece of copper wire) the two cells will be in series and you will get about 12 amperes. All the above refers to 110 volt pressure.

Fig. 25 shows the "A C R Adjustable, Underwriters' Model." This machine has two binding posts, one of which connects, of course, directly with adjustment lever. Connect a wire to each post. Move lever clear over to "in," turn on current and adjust to suit. The contacts are excellent. Keep them clean. In case the contact spring should ever get loose remove the lever and bend the spring down a trifle. The adjustment is on a slate base, located under a heavy metal cap. The machine is quite light and the contact arrangement being so well protected it is an excellent rheostat for road work. Capacity 45 amperes on 110 volts or 25 amperes on 220 volts. All these machines are protected by perforated sheet metal casing. The coils are independent of each other and are very easily removed and replaced. The coil connection is through machine turned lugs, the coils being held in place by two set screws. As a matter of plain justice to the Motiograph people it must be said that their rheostat construction is very fine.

The rheostat put out with the Standard machine is of the metal gird type and is very light in weight. It complies fully with Underwriters' requirements. The makers claim it will supply 75 amperes, although built for normal load of but 25. This is rather a large claim, it seems to me. Has but two binding posts and is non-adjustable.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Although the summer season has not quite arrived, either by arrangement of the calendar or weather conditions, it has a strong forerunner in the effects on business. All the picture houses are complaining of a falling off in receipts to a more or less extent, and those located in the vicinity of sites for open-air places are particular complainants. The aerodromes are multiplying fast and making a strong bid for the patronage of people who care for indoor amusements only during the cooler season. Many such places have been opened during the past week, and the proprietors report good business. The open-air places have many advantages over the closed-in places of exhibition, and the proprietors of the latter have already been stirred up to a spirit of active hostility against them. Complaints have been made by the scores and demands for protection against the open-lot are made upon both film rental exchanges and the manufacturers.

The aerodrome is not a new thing. It has been operated for the past two or three summers, but this year is probably the first in which the regular exhibitors have evinced so much hostility towards it. The exhibitors who pay license to the Motion Picture Patents Company are especially active in the protests, and their complaints have not been in vain. In several instances the Patents Company has refused to license open-air places and have notified the licensed exchanges that they must not give the places film service. This action is based upon the presentment of exhibitors who have been in business all winter and have complied with all the Patents Company's requirements, that it is unfair to them to be compelled to compete with aerodromes, and the Patents Company should not license such places. The regulars contend that, in the summer, picture places in the cities are run at a loss and the little business secured should not be taken from them. In the fall, winter and spring the regular exhibitor gives up his good money and makes business good for the exchanges and manufacturers. He is entitled to some recognition for this and should not be deprived of the stipend he looks for in the summer time by the open-air man, who is lost to view when weather conditions put the open lots out of working order.

These complaints ars certainly worthy of some consideration; but, of course, conditions govern, as in all other cases. Where the open-air enterprise comes in direct competition with a permanently established house it is not unreasonable for the proprietor of the regular house to demand protection, particularly when he is led to believe it can be given him.

It cannot be denied that the closed-in house has an uphill game to play when the good, old summer time rolls around, and the open lots have them at a great disadvantage. The feeling on the part of the former, as against the latter, seems more keen this year than at any previous time. This is accounted for by the fact that more of the regular houses are trying to keep open this summer than in any previous similar season. The activity of the Building Department the past year, with regard to requiring more respect for the regulations bearing upon ventilation and exits, has led the regulars to believe that their places are suitable for summer resorts, and hundreds of places that in previous years closed upon the approach of the hot weather will remain open this year.

A party who is apparently pretty closely identified with the administrative department of the Motion Picture Patents Company, but who declined to be quoted, stated that his company will give all regular exhibitors all possible protection against competition from the aerodromes. He said the company would see that such temporary competitors would not be licensed to operate within certain distance of a regular licensee; in fact, several had been refused licenses. Of course, if the regular exhibitor closed his house for the summer the aerodrome complying with all conditions would naturally be entitled to recognition.

The party in question was asked if he believed the refusal of a license would stop the competition. To this he replied, with frank positiveness. He said that was not the point at issue. "Our patrons look to us for protection by withholding licenses under certain conditions. We do not claim that our refusal to grant a license will put any man out of business; but we do claim that when we refuse a license the rejected party will not get licensed film service. There our work ceases. We cannot stop him from opening the place and getting independent service. Our patrons cannot hold us accountable for that."

While on this topic, I asked the gentleman if it was true that the Patents Company dare not bring suits for infringements against exhibitors, because, as stated in a recent publication, "the patents have not been adjudicated in the courts and until they have they are forbidden to bring suits."

"This is a unique evasion, I should say," was the reply. "Or, perhaps I should call it by its proper name—a misleader. Infringement suits are tests of the legality of patents, which cannot be adjudicated until they are brought before the courts."

Carl Laemmle, of Chicago, announces that he is going to manufacture moving picture films. That's just like Carl. He is so wrapped up in the business he won't be happy until he swims in every branch of it. He certainly has the same right as anyone else to jump into the manufacturing field, if he so wishes. I have read his prospectus and it makes me feel good. He says he will pay the highest salaries for the best photographers, stage managers and professionals in the world, and in like manner he asks for manuscripts. Laemmle is a hustler and he has hosts of friends, who wish him success in everything he undertakes. But this does not do away with the coming events that are foreshadowed by his latest venture. The more the manufacturers multiply, the more sure it becomes that the middle man—the film renter—will go to the wall, and direct dealings with exhibitors, with ultimate direct control of the exhibition field by manufacturers, will develop. There are to-day, both in the licensed and independent fields, more subjects than most rental exchanges can handle with sufficient remuneration for the amounts paid out. All over the country renters are complaining of the slaughter of rental rates. This cutting is gradually working towards the manufacturers, because it is reducing orders. The better class of service cannot be maintained at cut-rate prices, because the exchange must have a good working capital to keep purchasing the new films as they come out. Not having this, orders are cut down and the manufacturers find their production gradually shrinking. Self-preservation being the first law of nature, the manufacturers then set about to find a way by which they may get their goods into the exhibiting places and increase their productions.

I have heard some exhibitors say it would be a blessing to them if the renters were out of business and rentals could be made direct from the manufacturers. I do not agree with them. I maintain that the rental system is as a safety buffer. The centralization of power of the exhibition field is kept off by the rental system. With that wiped out the exhibitors would gradually lose ground, one by one the nickelodeons would be absorbed, the poor-paying ones to be closed and the profitable places continued in operation as direct outlets for the producers. Many have laughed at this suggestion, but its features are no more funny than those that attend the gigantic theatrical manipulations that have full sway throughout the United States. The modern systems of circuits and chains work wonders. I have had some experience in the moving picture business, and have watched events closely. Unless there is more unity of spirit between the three great factions involved something is going to happen. If the exhibitors do not organize and remain so, and the film renters do not organize and co-operate with them, the great, big bow-wow is going to chew them up. I say this in an advisory spirit, not as an extremist, or one desiring to brew trouble. I say both these branches should be united and occasionally consult and be able to bring into consultation the manufacturers, with a view to pointing out and promoting the interests of the business as affecting all. The trouble is that more dignity than acumen and diplomacy governs most of us. The best year of the moving picture industry in this country was 1907-8. More troubles were buried at the festive board than all the courts combined could settle. Those were the good, old days!

The United Manufacturing Company, 335 Broadway, New York, ask us to say that they are prepared to supply parts for Edison, Powers and other machines at very low prices. They also manufacture a current-saver, for alternating current, which they claim costs less to install than any other on the market and which actually saves its cost to the exhibitor in a short time, besides giving him a steadier and better light.

THE FUTURE OF THE FILM.

By Archer McMackin.

I heard a cry lately from Mr. Knocker, the gentleman with the yellow streak, that the motion picture as a source of amusement is becoming less popular. The protest was as absurd as it was feeble. It was drowned out entirely by the handclapping of an approving public that crowded the capacious nickel theatre, while a throng outside stood patiently waiting their opportunity to enter. I am not a friend of Mr. Knocker's; I merely sat alongside of him in the theatre and heard the remark addressed to a friend. It was an hour and fifteen minutes since I entered. I had seen 4,000 feet of magnificent film, and I felt exceedingly guilty of having cheated the proprietor of the theatorium out of 50 cents. I paid ten cents for the seventy-five minutes of enjoyment. The program started with a soul-stirring little melodrama. A couple of short comedies followed. There was an illustrated song, and following that an automobile ride up the boulevards of Paris. After that a film d'art picture ended the performance.

Mr. Knocker's remarks, I must confess, worried me a little, so I decided to look into the matter. As a starter I questioned a number of nickel theatre proprietors.

"Business is good and getting better," one remarked. "I can't begin to accommodate the crowds that come, and I am opening a place next door."

The interview given out by Professor Frederick Starr, of Chicago, regarding the motion picture as a source of amusement and instruction should be sufficient to denounce for all time the sneerer. The hearty approval of other eminent men of the country should further increase the confidence in the stability of the public's patronage of the nickel theatre. Great men have said that it is good. Then it has come to stay.

The future of the film is greater than can be pictured here. Comparatively it is the same with the film as is the simple daguerreotype to the art work of the leading photographers now. I see the day fast approaching when the film d'art theatre will take its place between the two great institutions, the art gallery and the drama. In that day we will have the story written by some G. Bernard Shaw, Tolstoi or Ibsen, in which some latter-day Bernhardt, Irving or Mansfield will take the principal role.

Mrs. So and So will inquire of her friend: "Have you seen Irving in Ibsen's 'Hedda Gabler' at the Art Theatre?"

I questioned some leading moving picture men about the ultimate destiny of the photographic side of the motion picture. Among them was Mr. George K. Spoor and G. M. Anderson, of the firm of Essanay.

"Will it be possible to make pictures as ideally artistic as in —well, stationary photography?" I could think of no other way of putting it.

"The limitations of the camera; especially the motion picture camera, as it is to-day," Mr. Spoor said, "are great, yet I thoroughly believe that what the other camera has done and will do can be duplicated by the moving picture camera."

As an art the motion picture film will take its place equally with the other arts, and the epigram quoted in the instance of painting can be said of motion picture photography as well: "All passes; Art alone endures."

AN OPERATORS' SCHOOL.

Harry H. Lamount, who is well known in theatrical circles, has started a training school for operators in this city. This is an institution which has been much needed, to judge from the number of inquiries that we have received. Under the able tutorship of Mr. Henry Kelly, it is proposed to give such practical instruction as will enable any man of ordinary intelligence and education to become an expert moving picture operator. The learner will be taught how to make slight repairs to his machine; how to get the best light; the names of the different parts of the machine, and where they belong and what are their functions. Many times a machine has to be sent to the repair shop because the operator does not know enough to make slight repairs, which usually can be done on the premises in a few minutes. We learn that operators who are at present holding positions are taking advantage of the practical instruction under Mr. Kelly. There is no lack of operators, but there does seem to be openings for more experts, and Mr. Lamount's school therefore deserves encouragement. It is located at No. 467 Eighth avenue, near Thirty-fourth street, New York City.

TONED AND TINTED PICTURES.

There is much scope for chemical ingenuity in the toning and tinting of moving picture positives, as has been several times pointed out in these pages. Toning or tinting, or a combination of both, produces nice color effects which are always appreciated by audiences, especially when those effects harmonize with the colors of the original subject. The World Film Manufacturing Company of Portland, Oregon, have made some successful experiments in this direction, and they send us for our inspection twelve specimen films, toned and tinted. These include various shades of green, red, brown and sepia. All are exceedingly good and striking, and please not only ourselves, but other persons in the film business who have seen them. We particularly like a reddish brown color which the World Company have worked out for themselves. Also the charming photographic or sepia browns included among the films sent. These colors when seen on the screen must look very pleasing, and we desire to encourage the World Company in their efforts to popularize this kind of colored film.

INDEPENDENT EXCHANGES NOT BUYING.

Important Interview with an Independent Manufacturer.

"How are films selling?" we inquired of an Independent manufacturer.

"Fairly well," he answered. "But nothing like they ought to."

"Then the Independent exchanges are not heavy buyers?"

"Well, I should say not; with a few exceptions the others seem more intent on buying up second hand stuff and renovating it."

"Are we to infer from this that they do not like the quality of the new American productions?"

"Oh, no; they praise our work, but do not encourage us by placing orders. The independent movement will never succeed if the exchanges and exhibitors are satisfied to run any old stuff instead of encouraging the Independent manufacturer and importer and fighting the trust on the lines of quality. The trust manufacturers know this and know that such half-hearted competition is not worthy of any aggressive opposition."

"What do you think is the reason why the exchanges are not more liberal purchasers of new films? You ought to be selling more than ——— copies, you cannot make it pay otherwise. There are many more than ——— Independent exchanges."

"Yes, and I believe that just strikes at the root of the trouble. There are too many exchanges. If half of them were eliminated I believe we would sell more films. I base my belief on the fact that exchanges in sections which are not overrun with competition are the best customers we have. There are a while lot of pikers in the film exchange business who are not making any money for themselves and spoiling the chances of others making any."

"How can the conditions be altered for the better? Of course, if these fellows are not making money you cannot expect them to buy new film."

"Oh, they will buy new film fast enough—but at their own price. But if new productions do not have a fixed commercial value they at least represent a fixed outlay on the part of the manufacturer and must be sold at a fixed price else he will not be reimbursed. I notice that a new Independent Film Protective Association has been formed, but in the announcement they have made they do not touch upon the real reason why their business is falling off. And no association can hold the business if it is not done by quality and the quantity and the goods is to be had."

"This suggests," we remarked, "that the time is ripe for the Independent manufacturers to get together and form an alliance for mutual protection and the advancement of their interests. In fact, they will have to or some of them will go to the wall. And, in view of the discouraging condition, don't you think there are too many Independent manufacturers—we mean separate interests? If a number of them could be got together and form one respectably capitalized company, pool their interests and erect one well equipped factory, they would be able to produce better films at less cost."

"Yes, indeed, that would be a great scheme, but who is to carry it out? Each manufacturer, no matter how small, thinks himself bigger or of more importance than the next one; besides they would hold their plants at high valuation and I am afraid the idea is impracticable—at present."

And there the conversation ended.

Mattoon, Ill.—Extensive improvements are to be made to the Lyric Theater here, of which Nathan Stein is manager.

COMING HEADLINERS.

Before July 4th, during which week it will no doubt be in phenomenal demand, the Vitagraph Company will release in series "The Life of George Washington," a high art subject on which this company has been actively engaged for many weeks, if not months. We hear rumors that this will even surpass their "Life of Napoleon," and when we recall the praise which was bestowed upon that double reel in this country and which was only a tithe of the appreciation that it has received in Napoleon's own land, we look forward to a rare treat in their rendering of the early life and struggles and final success of the greatest figure of American history. To present such a subject with historical accuracy, with due dignity and with a proper conception of its possibilities, is indeed a pretentious undertaking, but their past record leads us to believe that the Vitagraph Company will do it full justice. Every American man, woman and child will want to see this film, and we venture to prophecy that its sale will go far beyond the high-water mark of any film that this company has ever produced. The first reel, treating of the early life of Washington, will be released on June 29, and another, showing his military exploits, on July 3.

"Washington Under the British Flag" is the title of the first reel. The second, "Washington Under the Americal Flag," is the best reel of the two. In this the character of Washington is impersonated by a noted Broadway actor and the inspiring scenes cannot fail to arouse the enthusiasm of the spectators to the highest pitch.

This week the Pathes release a film d'art representation of Victorien Sardou's "La Tosca" by a company of talented French actors. This will be followed next week by another of equal power, and one each week to follow. Still setting the pace in the Marathon race for film quality, Pathe's art film of this week merits an adequate review, which it will receive in our next issue.

The Kalem Company are also at work on two feature productions. We have seen a section of a film which they will release next week, "A Priest of the Wilderness," illustrating the life of Father Joge among the Indians. This is a historical subject and the company are taking great pains to present it with an accurate setting and fidelity to details. Mr. Marion, of the Kalem Company, also confided to us that they would shortly produce a military drama representing a possible invasion of America by the Japanese. Is it possible that when this film gets to Washington it will stir up as much activity in the War Department as did the publication in England lately of a story, "An Englishman's Home"?

A SUCCESSFUL FILM EXCHANGE.

Nothing can better illustrate the tremendous growth of the Film Exchange business than to trace back that of the National Film Company of Detroit, who have just moved into their elegantly appointed new quarters at 69-71 Griswold street. This company came into the field two years ago and opened an office at 100 Griswold street in one room. They started on a small scale and did a very nice business, giving to their customers who were lucky enough to get into the National band wagon the very best that was on the market. They only handled a few customers, but every one was a walking ad. for them until they were compelled to add another office and buy more films. During all the hard times their business kept increasing and their purchases were double what they were originally. It became a by-word, "Once a National customer, always one." Today they are occupying an entire lower floor in one of the finest buildings in Detroit with a floor space 60 by 150. Here they fitted up the most luxurious quarters of any film exchange in the country. As you come into the big double doors you are reeeived by a clerk, whose office you step into and who is there to listen to your troubles. Off from this office is the spacious office of Phil. Gleichman, the manager of the company, whose courteous treatment has made possible the big business now enjoyed by the "National." His office is the acme of comfort and impresses a stranger at once with its air of hospitality. Off from this is a spacious room which is used for display purposes. Here is a sample of every machine, machine part and equipment of every description used in a perfect moving picture theatre. Back of this is a large room used for shipping and examining films together with a plant for renovating films. The entire offices are finished in white and gold, with golden oak and mahogany furniture. The National are to be congratulated for making their quarters equal to the service which is conceded by their customers to be excelled by none.

ACCESSORIES FOR MOVING PICTURES.

There is great art in properly dressing the moving picture. We mean the selection or painting of the scene, and if it be an interior, such as a room or a hall, the choice of proper furniture, ancient or modern. Some producers appear to think that the furniture in the scene is of small importance. It is not so. The careful producer will fit his furniture to the period of his story, and moreover he will select suitable furniture and accessories. If the story deals with incidents of a by-gone time, then there is obviously scope for delving into the antique. The greatest stage producers have always paid particular attention to this point, which is often neglected by those having the charge of making moving pictures. We think it would be of service to many in directing attention to this point. Critics and audiences nowadays are getting so exacting that it is a dangerous thing to have anything out of place in the moving picture, or the wrong thing for the right one. This especially applies to furniture, etc., and what may be called the accessories of the picture.

A MODEL MACHINE FACTORY.

Recently a Moving Picture World man had the pleasure of inspecting the plant of the Enterprise Optical Company, makers of the Motiograph, under personal guidance of Mr. A. C. Roebuck, president of the company. Mr. Roebuck is very proud of the plant, as well he may be. The visitor was literally astonished at what he saw. Not only is the Motiograph made here, but the gas-making machines and many other motion picture appliances put out by the company. Every single act of manufacture is done at these shops except the casting. The machine shops, pattern shops, buffing rooms and plating rooms occupy an entire floor of the large building, two sides of which are almost solid plate glass. It is almost like being out of doors, so far as light is concerned. On this floor is an immense vault, 20 x 60, I think Mr. Roebuck said it was, in which are thousands upon thousands of finished parts, as well as hundreds of valuable tools. But it was the machine equipment which filled me with surprise—surprise that the manufacture of motion picture appliances could justify so immense an outlay. As is well known, gear-cutting machines are very expense, yet I here saw three of different types. Another very expensive machine was the automatic milling machine, on which sprocket and all the other small shafts of the Motiograph are made. This machine works in thousandths of an inch. There were four or five automatic screw-cutting machines, a whole row of fine drill presses and lathes and other machines galore, all of the finest. That the manufacture of one motion picture machine and a few other motion picture appliances could justify installing, or support after installation, such a plant, the writer would not have believed had he not viewed it with his own eyes. The assembling rooms were closed (it was after working hours) at the time of my visit. I should like to have seen them. The offices and plant occupy three entire floors of the building, which I should think to be at least 150 feet square. Judging from the immense number of parts and the number of machines the writer saw in course of construction, the Motiograph surely cannot be a drug on the market.

A NOTABLE FILM PRODUCER.

Chicago takes a just and pardonable delight in the size of its buildings, the vastness of its business enterprises and the success achieved by many of its progressive citizens. The daily papers of that city are more liberal or more patriotic than those of Eastern cities in exploiting the business enterprise of its leading men, and W. N. Selig, his wonderful studio and the gigantic stunts he makes in the film producing field has come in for a large share of this newspaper publicity.

True it is that the record of the Selig Polyscope Company has grown within a few years from feet to miles. Rapid growth of an industrial enterprise scarcely attracts attention here in America. We have come to look upon rapidity of development as an inherent right, and so it is. No country that the sun shines upon to-day can compare with ours for natural resources, and brain ever camps on the trail of opportunity. Capital seeks new friends constantly. The vogue of motion pictures, the poor man's natural amusement and privilege, has probably grown more rapidly than any other one field of endeavor one could call to mind, and still the giant stride it has made was the natural outcome of supply and demand and therefore a natural and not a forced development. In the city of Chicago in the short space of eighteen months has grown what is said to be the largest motion picture plant in America, headed and pushed to its present magnitude by a native Chicagoian—W. N. Selig.

Mr. Selig became interested in the possibilities of the motion picture industry several years ago, and at once set about acquiring a practical knowledge of the mechanical features of the making and producing of feature films.

Ground broken for the factory site now occupied by the Selig Polyscope Company, at Western avenue and Byron street, covers a whole city block, and the plant has shown such growth now that it has been forced to take an option on several other acres in that vicinity. The Selig Polyscope Company has the reputation that they can produce anything on earth in the motion picture line, as they have the scenery, the properties, horses, vehicles of every description and animals of all kinds. They have also brought to Chicago at different times, real Indians from the reservation, with their tepees and all their trappings, and have shown in their pictures the real Indian chiefs who took part in Custer's last fight. They also have a large artificial lake in their grounds which covers 100 x 150 feet, with banks so arranged that in a few hours it can be scenically equipped to represent a body of water in any part of the globe. It is one of Selig's adjuncts, and in a shed near this, accommodating a miniature lake, is stored water craft of every kind and description, from a motor boat with a six-horse-power gasoline engine to the birch bark canoe of the primitive red man. All these boats are convertible. The deft scenic artist and his aids, the carpenter and property master, can turn out anything from a battleship to a punt, and do it whenever called upon.

No plant in the world to-day could be more completely stocked for picture production than the Selig Polyscope Company, owned and controlled by Mr. W. N. Selig, a native Chicagoian, and a man who can point to his almost Alladdin-like success with deserved pride. Certainly Chicago can well feel flattered by the wonderful business foresight displayed by one of her native sons.

A PROGRESSIVE SLIDE CONCERN.

Evolution is an important feature of the picture show houses. Within the past year a pleasing change has developed in the quality and character of the still pictures and more especially in the announcements and advertising slides shown in the nickel theaters. In time past the slide maker seemed to take as little trouble as possible with the subjects entrusted to him. Now things are different and while this is largely due to competition it is also largely due to the survival of the fittest and the fact that some of the newer aspirants in that field are more eminently fitted to raise the standard of quality. Foremost among these are the Brayton Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, whose advertising slides have opened up a field of remuneration to the exhibitor. They have spent time and money in perfecting this idea and in popularizing the advertising slide and have now a large clientele among the exhibitors who are rapidly adopting this legitimate means of popularizing their shows and increasing their profits. In this connection t is but fair to say that it is a pleasure to read the many letters of appreciation this firm receives from its satisfied customers in marked contrast to the complaints that have reached us as to the tardy, if not dishonest, methods of some song slide makers and one in particular, whose name still continues to be mentioned in letters of protest.

FEATURE FILMS.

Among the recent and coming releases of the International Projecting and Producing Company are some films that deserve the widest exhibition and more than passing attention. "The Birth of a Big Gun," an industrial subject by Cricks & Martin, made at the famous Armstrong works in England, is a film of very great interest. Others of importance are "Ski Runners of the Italian Army," "Italian Artillery," "Airship Zeppelin." Other Independent films of note for the week are "Squaw's Revenge," bearing the Bison trade-mark, and "The Convict," a Great Northern. Some independent exchanges claim that they are not able to obtain films of the desired quality. They are indeed hard to please if they are not satisfied with those we have mentioned and many others that are now on the market. The American manufacturers are improving rapidly. The Eastern exchanges have not as yet exploited the films of the World Film Manufacturing Company, of Portland, Ore., but we hear from our correspondents in the Far West that the work of this concern is meeting with the best success. As they are located where the background of Nature is at its best, we echo the wishes of many Easterners to have a peep at some of their work, which, to judge from some small samples that have been sent us, is indeed of very high photographic quality.

ON THE SCREEN.

By "Lux Graphicus."

Maude Adams objects to being moving pictured. I don't blame her. She probably has her reasons. I think I can guess one. If I were a celebrity and somebody wanted to hand me down to posterity on celluloid I should want to feel sure that the somebody was equal to the work of satisfying me. Miss Adams' objection prossibly lies round this aspect of things. If she could feel confident of being done justice to she probably wouldn't mind. There is one thing that every woman knows. And that is what pleases her. The man who offered the actress $50,000 to be allowed to take Maude Adams' moving picture clearly didn't please her. It isn't every man who can please every woman: or vice versa.

Pity the American horse didn't win the English Derby. There would have been some crowded audiences in the American vaudeville houses if it had. Unfortunately the English King was the victor, and London went mad with excitement. London is a stodgy place mostly but when it breaks out, which is not often, it has Broadway on New Year's Eve badly beaten. The English Derby is the oldest and most coached horse race in the world. I hope an American horse will win it next year. The pictures of the race AND the crowd of 500,000, would form a fine subject for American screens. Sorter Coney Island inland.

I notice the' Essanay people are putting their pictures on the English market. Kalem, Vitagraph, Biograph, Edison, Selig, Lubin are already represented there so that American pictures will have every chance of a show on the other side. They should be very popular. A friend writes me this week that the moving picture theater in Britain has become a craze. I know what that means. Simply this: that moving pictures "over the way" are as firmly fixed in public favor as they are here. American manufacturers will find it to their interest to specially cultivate the British market. There is money there for good American productions.

Few people in this country realize how popular good American productions are in Britain. The Eastman Kodak Company's photographic preparations and cameras predominate there. American patent medicines; tobacco; boots, library furniture; watches; canned goods; musical instruments; oil; clocks; sewing machines make mountains of money there. The phonograph pervades the entire land; so does the automobile; so does the roller skate. All these things are American in origin. The same success awaits the moving picture there if it is intelligently marketed. The "electric theater," as the m. p. house is called in Britain, owes its present success to American enterprise.

Of course films are cheaper in Britain than in America: 6 and 8 cents a foot. At those prices the British manufacturers are not making money. Competition, too, is very keen. I am advised that the trade is in a very bad way—so bad, that many collapses are imminent. No wonder. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." The making of moving picture films is no child's play. It demands great skill, knowledge and care. The Know-it-all, who knows nothing, is as prolific the other side of the Atlantic as here, with the usual result—Failure.

Most of the American made subjects that I have seen are suitable for the British market. I count out "hold-ups;" wild West dramas; Civil War episodes; historical scenes and incidents. The average Briton is supremely indifferent to all these. Coon or nigger subjects are popular with him. He hates sentiment or emotion; he likes comedy; farce; drama; tragedy; humor. He likes pictures of the Biograph; Kalem; Pathe kind; and those of Edison, Essanay, Lubin, Selig productions which deal with the broad aspects of things instead of purely American themes. I hope I make myself clear.

For I would like to help the American manufacturer to sell his films, not only in Britain, but elsewhere. The markets of the world are open. But those markets must be studied, of course. That is one of the elements of business. The reason why there are so many American theatrical failures in London is that the people do not understand the entertainments offered. "The Chorus Girl" with Rose Stahl is a success. Why? The people understand it. "The College Widow," an Ade play, failed. Why? The niceties and details of American college life are not understood in London. People there don't know what a "fair co-ed" is, so Elsie Janis wouldn't go at all. Comprenez vous?

Another hint: American made pictures on English subjects would provoke smiles. Dickens' plays, for example. If American producers would try and realize Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Uncle Remus, and show American life of the best kind of the present day success would follow in Britain. The average Briton has heard of New York, Niagara and the Yellowstone Park; and he has seen illustrations of them in the paper. And that's about all he knows of America. Vaguely he peoples Fifth avenue and Broadway with Indians, and scraggy necked galoots smoking long cigars and expectorating violently. By the average Briton I mean the patron of the Electric Theater. Worth the while of the American film manufacturers to enlighten him on the real state of things!

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The conversion of the Majestic Theater into a moving picture house is an event of first rate importance, for the Majestic, which is situated on Columbus Circle, is pretty well in the heart of New York City and it is a high-class theater, ranking with the best. Presumably the Shuberts, not wishing the house to remain dark in the Summer, are trying an experiment at the Majestic in giving exhibitions of moving pictures sandwiched between chunks of vaudeville. The result of the experiment will, of course, be watched with interest. If it succeeds, then we may expect other Broadway and uptown theaters to follow suit.

The Majestic is a very large theater and it takes a great number of people to fill it. It is also a beautiful theater. Its situation is unrivaled for tapping a vast section of New York's population. A little while ago, when writing about a neighboring moving picture house, I suggested that the district of Columbus Circle is one in which a first-class moving picture theater could be profitably placed. I wonder if the Shuberts have adopted my suggestion? If they have and they read this column, they will probably be glad of a few hints as to how to run their theater on a profit-paying basis.

When I visited the house the other day there was a fair-sized audience. The programme consisted of vaudeville, songs, moving and talking pictures. The vaudeville was just tolerated. It is true that I was present in the afternoon, when things are generally flat and dull, but the audience was sufficiently large to enable me to form an opinion as to how they regarded this innovation at the Majestic. Their interest chiefly centered in the pictures. These, however, I was sorry to observe, were a month or two old. Nevertheless, the Biograph and Pathe subjects attracted great attention, and, more remarkable still, a phenomenon in the moving picture theater, occasionally elicited considerable applause.

It is a moot point whether the Majestic is not too large a house for moving pictures—the people at the back of it are a long way from them. Still, the enterprise of the Shuberts should not find any difficulty in filling the place. What is wanted, of course, is less vaudeville, or none at all, and more pictures. Not old subjects, but the very latest releases. Then the manager might try the effect of a little orchestral music, instead of the simple unaccompanied piano.

Experience shows that the Keith & Proctor houses are successful with moving pictures alone, and there is no reason why the Majestic should not be as successful. Between Columbus Circle and 125th street, on the West Side, there are a large number of people who would, no doubt, be constant visitors to the house if a suitable program of pictures were provided. Then, of course, there is always a floating population of New York City in search of cheap entertainment.

Evidently, then, the theater magnates of New York City are seriously considering the moving picture as a money-making proposition. Let them go about the business on the lines I have indicated and they will be successful. Half-and-half measures are worse than useless. A half-million of people in New York City daily want good pictures. This is probably a larger number than all the visitors to the vaudeville and theater houses combined and it is worth while catering for, in a liberal, intelligent and generous way.

Eradicating Aunty.—A Biograph comedy in which a newly married couple introduce some novel features in securing the departure of a too officious aunt and uncle. The acting is in perfect keeping with the subject and the technical quality of the picture is beyond criticism.

The Dog and the Sausage.—An Essanay film in which there is a good deal of difficulty caused by two errand boys changing baskets. In one is a dog and in the other some sausage. They get to the wrong places and all kinds of trouble ensue. The comic features are emphasized and the film is rewarded with hearty laughs.

Comments on the Week's Films.

Instead of singling out any one film of the week for special mention, it is our pleasure to note that the average quality was very high and more even than usual. In spite of the warm days and evenings, the metropolitan shows were well patronized and marked appreciation paid to the program of each day. Excellent variety of subject and freshness of treatment were, no doubt, responsible for this, and it was remarked that there was little of the sameness prevailing that has been seen in times past. The subjects ranged "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," and at least one of each day's release stood out as a strong attraction. The well-acted drama, "What Drink Did," is still holding the attention of the public in the smaller shows and teaching the lesson of temperance forcefully and effectively, to judge from the remarks heard among the spectators. The production of such a subject was a bold move on the part of Biograph, and their capable company of actors did the subject full justice. Lubin provided the necessary comedy to relieve the strain of the day's program. "The Curfew Bell" (Edison); a rendering of Dickens' famous story, "Oliver Twist" (Vitagraph), and two good comedies by Gaumont made an excellent Tuesday program. Wednesday's show was strong in drama, with "Tender Cords" (Urban-Eclipse) and Pathe's "Saved by a Waif." Variety was supplied by a clever magical picture, "The Magic Carpet," also by Urban, and two of the usual funny Essanay skits. Industry was represented by Pathe's "Making Tambourines." The releases of the 3d contained a masterful, though short, emotional drama by Biograph, "His Duty," a touching story, clearly and convincingly told without the aid of sub-titles. They also furnished a good comedy, but the feature of the program was "Fighting Bob," a Selig drama, more easily followed than most Selig dramas and elaborately and convincingly staged. Kalem's "A Child of the Sea" kept up the average in the issues of the 4th, supported by a strong drama by Edison, "A Wife's Ordeal," and offset by comedies by the same makers that were quite out of the ordinary run. The feature of the 5th was "Saved from Conviction," a Gaumont film which was well produced and held the interest of the spectator. "The Oriental Mystic," a magical comedy by Vitagraph, introduced some fresh ideas and was well appreciated. Altogether, the issues for each day of the past week contained at least one specially strong dramatic subject, and the other releases were sufficiently good to create a favorable impression in the minds of the public.

"The Hold-up Held Up."—An Edison comedy which offers a novelty in hold-ups. The two highwaymen are greatly surprised when the man who was robbed turns the tables and not only gets his money back, but succeeds in landing them in cells. The film is short, but is lively, and the technical qualities are quite satisfactory.

"A Wife's Ordeal."—A picture from the Edison studio which has strong dramatic possibilities that are well worked out. One can't say that the subject is entirely pleasing, though good acting, even in somewhat unpleasant subjects, is always interesting. The dramatic possibilities are numerous, perhaps too numerous for the unity of the picture. It is better to have one, or at most, two, while in this picture there are a number which might be called dramatic situations, and each one performs its part in detracting from the interest of the climax, when the husband discovers his mistake, realizing at the same time the sacrifice the wife made for him. That he takes her back is a fitting close to a powerful drama. The inference is that the author wished to convey the impression that the artist's motives were wrong since he allowed him to be afflicted with permanent blindness. Photographically the film has much to commend it. All the recent Edison films are technically excellent, the tone values of the pictures being maintained at a very high standard.

"A Soldier's Heart."—A Pathe drama which holds the interest of the audience. Perhaps its best feature is the lesson it gives to meddlers. It presents a tender picture of filial devotion when the young lieutenant leaves his betrothal ceremonies to meet his aged mother. And there is another tender picture when his betrothed and her father go to his lodgings and meet the mother there. While the film presents no thrills it tells a wholesome story in an interesting way, and for that is to be commended. The technical quality is excellent. Some of the interiors reproduce the lace hangings so faithfully that they look almost like real ones. Without mawkish sentimentality, or unnatural so-called realism this picture will add to any programme in which it is included.

"Protector of Animals."—A Pathe comedy in which the real or fancied insincerity of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is admirably caricatured. Perhaps the difficulty here was because the apparently toothsome stew was transformed into a live cat by the magic of the protector's new fluid. At any rate the banquet broke up in a severe drubbing for the able professor who had solved the problem of restoring to life the animals killed, and dared to exercise his power over the society's banquet.

"The Gambler's Honor."—A Pathe which seems to have little point, at least to the non-gambling portion of the world. It may be questioned whether it is wise to exhibit the gambler's distorted conception of honor which impels him to take articles from his own house and sell them to obtain money to pay his gambling debts. This may be gamblers' honor, but it is not a type of honor to be exhibited to promiscuous audiences.

"The Truer Love."—A Vitagraph drama which tells a story that is gloomy enough in some ways, but ends happily and for that reason is to be commended. The rejection of the artist because he will not give up his adopted daughter, and the rejection of the former girl by the artist after she is a widow and the union of the artist and his adopted daughter form climaxes to an interesting love story. The moral is obvious without the effort of elaborate study. Technically the film is satisfactory, not many weak places showing in the photography. One noticeable error occurs. The artist puts on a light coat and starts to go out. When he appears on the outside he has on a black one, and later without any apparent reason he appears in the orginal light one. This mixture of little things creates a curious impression.

"The Oriental Mystic."—A Vitagraph comedy which affords opportunity to show some curious bits of magic, including a number of strange appearances and disappearances. These were all well managed and appear more natural than some of the magic films.

"Are You the Man?"—Lubin has developed a comedy in this film which may well set one thinking. A gentleman bets that he can ask the first ten men he meets on the street the question at the head of this paragraph without being insulted. He undertakes it and he barely escapes with his life from some of them. While this picture is intended as a comic the result of asking the question creates dramatic scenes that are well worth considering. One can't help but ask why men are so touchy upon a subject which apparently applies to their personality in some undefined way. That they are touchy is illustrated in this film. Perhaps the treatment the questioner received is rather exaggerated, but there is every reason to think that in the main it is correct. At any rate, it is suggested that no one try the experiment. This comedy is too serious for that.

Making Tambourines.—A Pathe educational film in which the manufacture of tambourines is illustrated. It is short and while it is interesting it doesn't compare with some of the other educational films which the Pathes have put out. The photographic quality is not so good and the work itself is not so important. Then it is filled out at the end by introducing the tarantella and showing the use of the tambourine in a poorly acted dance. The posing at the close is out of place in an educational film.

The Sleeping Tonic.—An Essanay film which allows their comedian, Turpen, to do some more of his funny stunts. He can act the sleeping part quite as well as he does the livelier parts which have so often fallen to his lot, and the places he selects in which to fall asleep bring him several different kinds of trouble. In a few places the photography is weak.

Tender Chords.—An Eclipse in which dramatic possibilities are created out of a couple's separation. When it comes to dividing the clothes of the dead child the hearts of the disunited pair soften and they make up their differences and decide to live together again. The drama in this is made very strong by the exceptionally fine acting of the principals in the piece. They could scarcely do their parts better. It is a film which causes one to stop and think before passing on to the next one. The photographic quality of the picture is exceptionally good. The tone values are retained in all the photography and the reproduction which makes it exceedingly interesting merely as a picture.

The Magic Carpet.—In this Urban film the possession of a magic carpet gives opportunity for some magical stunts which are amusing. The introduction of an occasional film of this character adds to the output of a house, but the photographic quality should be better. In places it is very dim, perhaps due to the rapid movement of the figures. Whatever the cause may be, the film is not satisfactory in all places so far as the photographic qualities are concerned. The magic part is pleasing. Perhaps any magical features would be pleasing. They are out of the ordinary and they attract by that quality.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

June 7, 1909.

Editor THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Dear Sir:—In your issue of June 5th "An Exhibitor" writes of certain pictures which the Censorship Board has allowed to pass, and cries "Shame, Shame!" Then, as jealous or idle-minded people like to do, he speaks of "graft." The "graft" part of the letter we can put aside, as the make-up of the Censorship Board and its work to date speak for themselves. But as a question of honest judgment, it is quite likely that the public will sometimes condemn what the Censorship Board approves. The public might like what the Censorship Board condemns. Not all the members of the Board themselves agree on every picture, and the time will never come when all the public are equally well pleased. We would only ask, that the public form its judgments, not from printed descriptions of pictures, but from the pictures themselves, for almost any picture can be so described as to seem innocent—or to seem abominable.

For the rest—criticism is to be welcomed—sincere, honest criticism—the more the better. The "Exhibitor" whose letter occasions this letter, is perhaps not sincere, but it is a good time to answer a question:

What are the standards of the Board of Censorship?

Manufacturers have sometimes asked for a complete list of the things the Censorship Board objects to. We have never furnished the list. We have heard of censorship boards that had such lists, but it's beyond this board. No "killings," they say in some cities out West; so a certain French film d'art, the story of Louis XVI, culminated in a swift and decently-done, bloodless decapitation, an entirely harmless theatrical shadow on the screen. We passed it with hearty approval, but out West they decapitated the picture. In Omaha they "killed" a film because it brought disrespect on the police; in Chicago, I am told, the representation of any crime, in any connection, be it crime for crime's sake or an incident in a noble plot, is condemned. We do not condemn the representation of any crime; crime for its own sake we condemn, pictures whose chief appeal is to morbid appetite we condemn, bad taste where it becomes vulgarity we condemn. We condemn anything that seems dangerously suggestive in its tendencies. But barring indecency, barring ghoulishness, there is hardly any incident in life or drama that may not be so treated—presented with such a purpose shown in such a connection, as to be acceptable to a board of censorship which recognizes this fundamental fact:

The motion pictures are a legitimate form of the drama, and that the motion picture is entitled to draw WITH DISCRETION on any field of human interest for its themes.

The New York Board of Censorship takes its stand on that proposition. Now, for the detail: It is a matter of careful weighing and judgment. The board is composed (the sub-committee that does the censoring) of two district superintendents of public schools, two editors, two exhibitors, and the writer. In censoring, we put ourselves as far as we are able in the place of the audience, and ask, How will the picture affect this element, or that element, of the audience? Many pictures are well intended but crudely done, but where the effort is purely artistic in nature the Censorship Board leaves the matter to the public, which is final arbiter. Where the picture is in bad taste of a sort that would outrage the public, the board condemns it. Where crime is so represented as to seem likely to be contagious (suggestive), to leap from the screen and result in actual crime, it is condemned. Sometimes a powerful, sweeping plot carries the audience rapidly over many incidents that, if magnified out of proportion, or if represented for their own sake, would be objectionable; but the sum total of effect, the unified effect, is positive and harmless, or good. There have been themes of exceeding gruesomeness favorably passed by the Censorship Board—witness a French film recently approved but not yet issued, an episode of the Franco-Prussian war, where a father avenges a son. There is hanging and poison in the picture, but the effect is moving, solemn and almost profound. The picture is admirable—it is great—and to condemn it would be to put a ban on the creative effort, to restrict the essential liberty of the motion picture as a form of dramatic art. Yet there are hanging scenes we have condemned—poison scenes we have condemned. And so it goes. How, in common intelligence, can a censorship board catalogue its objections and then stand by the catalogue? The first good picture that comes along is likely to knock the catalogue into bits.

In other words, the Censorship Board acknowledges no other standard than its own best judgment—the common-sense judgment that a wise pater familias would apply to a show which his children frequent. Obviously this judgment is likely to err, and there is not a member of the Censorship Board who is not convinced that it has erred for this picture or that. The important thing is, that as the Censorship Board has assumed a sympathetic and co-operative attitude toward the motion picture business, so the public should assume an attitude, critical but sympathetic and co-operative, toward the Censorship Board.

For the results: Has the quality of motion pictures improved notably since the Censorship Board began to operate? The question answers itself. Has the general public assumed a more tolerant attitude toward motion pictures since the Censorship Board began to proclaim that motion pictures have a great present and greater future? Answer the question, Editors of the Trade Journals. And may the trade rest assured that one moving picture competitor is not going to be allowed to use the censorship as a club with which to give his rival a black eye. And may the critics of the Censorship Board be stern and watchful, but sincere!

JOHN COLLIER, Secretary.

[The good judgment shown by the Censorship Board, the fairness, the thoroughness and the patience that have marked their labors, and the noticeable effect it has produced on the public is so obvious to us that we gladly print in full the above reply of their secretary to a disgruntled attack upon their rulings by "An Exhibitor" in our last week's issue.—Ed. M. P. W.]

THE SINGER AND THE SONG.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Have read your article in May number of Moving Picture World about song slides and singers, and would like to say that a singer who has but one song to do a week has no excuse in not having that one ballad committed; should be able to sing it perfectly with flood light effect as well as with slides. However, we do not find many managers in moving picture theaters nowadays who think a singer is earning even $12 per week unless they sing from two to six songs in that time; even a "two-note" singer should do one song per week fairly well at least. I have found that the managers who expect singers to do one song a week pay more and appreciate the work more than those who call for six songs and then wonder why the songs are not committed.

Yours for more quality and less quantity in illustrated songs and singing,

VERA STANLEY,
Illustrated Singer.

CHICAGO NOTES.

How many people pay admission to the Loop theatres is not known, but the total must be enormous. It is of record that the Bijou Dream has handled 1,400 people in a single hour, in the upstairs theatre alone. This policy, however, eventually worked material injury to the goose that laid the golden egg, since shows were of necessity very, very short.

This thing of cutting the program down beyond reasonable limits will in time permanently injure any house. Especially is this true of theatres catering to semi-regular trade. Many managers will, when the house is full and people waiting for admission, issue orders to rush the film through, or to cut out part of the program. They thus make a few additional dollars that day, granted; but sooner or later there comes a time when there are no more crowded houses. The "get-the-money" manager then curses loud and deep, attributing the loss of business to about everything under the sun except the true cause, viz.: his own foolish policy.

Managers of theatres located in a business section, like the Loop, assert that their trade is all transient. The writer begs to differ. Except as to a comparatively insignificant, out-of-town trade, there is but a very small percentage of "transient" trade in the true sense of the term. The man or woman who comes downtown on business and "drops in" a nickel theatre is not a transient in the true sense, for the reason that he or she will, in all human probability, do this same thing from twenty-five to a hundred times in the course of a year. If he or she sees a short, or rotten, or both together, show it is remembered, and the next time that particular house is passed by. Moreover, it is quite likely friends will be told in course of conversation. This may not be felt much for a time, but sooner or later chickens come home to roost.

Wrinkles for Operators.

SOME QUESTIONS.

3517 Indiana Ave. Chicago, May 11, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am a practical electrician, but have been an operator only a short time, and I have noticed a great difference of opinion among operators on almost every question, and also a great difference in their work.

I heartily endorse the article of Mr. F. W. Sweet in the issue of May 8, on "Advice to Operators," but would have liked it better if he had been more definite in stating clearly just what his conception of "good work" was. I hope he will give us a little more "light" on that point, as he seems to have plenty of it.

In accordance with your invitation to operators to exchange their views through your publication I would like to ask some of "the experts" a few questions that I think will be of general interest.

What is the proper relation or proportion that the back focus should bear to the front or objective focus to get the best results?

Suppose I wish to project a 12-foot picture 60 feet with 30 amperes, direct current and a pair of 6½-inch condensers, what distance must they be set from the film? Also the same size picture at 40 and 90 feet.

What are the best combination of condensers to use under these various conditions: alternating current and calcium lights? Also will the same combination of condensers give the best possible results for the stereopticon under same conditions? Or will it be better to have a different combination? And why? A. L. VOORHEES.

WATCHING THE CARBONS.

By F. W. Sweet.

The space in your journal which in future you propose to devote to the interchange of ideas and experiences of operators, will certainly prove a boon to the craft, and with proper support from them will undoubtely become an important factor in the general uplift now going forward in the moving picture industry all over the country. To obtain good results upon the screen it is absolutely necessary to have good men in the operating booth, and to become proficient in their work they should be trained in a thorough manner, the same as in other lines of trade. Your special column opens a grand field through which this may be accomplished in a speedy and business-like manner, but to make this feature of your journal a success it will be necessary for you to have the hearty co-operation of the best class of men in the business from all over the country, and it seems to me that any one who is in possession of any ideas of value along these lines should be willing to bring them forth for the benefit of others in order that the business may be improved and put upon a higher plane than is the case just now; the other allied interests seem at present to be doing all in their power to bring this end about and it seems only fair that operators should be willing to do their part as they are sure to benefit from any improvement upon the present conditions.

Your generous spirit in opening up a way to bring this about is deserving of a hearty response all along the line and I trust the boys will look at this matter in a business-like way and that the influx of brainy ideas will start at once. I feel certain the interest will increase and the success of your plan be achieved. To start the Wrinkle Column off, I will submit an item which, while it may seem of little importance at the first glance, will, I am certain, be appreciated by every operator who tries it on his machine. The best part of it is that it does not cost anything.

I do not claim any credit for this as I found it out purely by accident and have taken advantage of it for the past six months; its greatest values lies in the fact that it has a twofold purpose, one is to obviate the necessity of looking at the arc light, in feeding the carbons or making any adjustments of the same, thus saving a good deal of the strain on the eyes; the other is that it insures a better illumination of the screen, giving no excuse for dark spots due to the flickering of the arc when the distance between the carbons becomes too great, as the points of the carbons are always in plain view of the operator and their relative distance from each, by this means the carbon may always be fed at just the proper time without any decrease in the illumination, and all this may be done without even looking at the lamp.

One day while replacing a cracked condenser I put the mount back on the lamp house in such a manner that one of the ventilating holes in the mount was on the upper side of the same and a little to the left of the center, or toward the operating side of the machine. In starting up my picture I noticed a beam of light of a rich, mellow hue on the front side of the booth. At first I paid no attention to this, but on looking a little later I saw the points of both carbons very clearly defined on the exact spot where the light had at first appeared, and on turning the hand wheel could see the exact movement of both carbons. This set me thinking and at the close of my lecture I started an investigation and found that by turning my condenser mount I could get the spot at almost any point I wanted it on the front of the booth, and now I always arrange to have it fall just beside the lookout window of the booth and in this position I can watch the screen and my arc lamp at the same time.

If one is operating without a booth the light will fall on the ceiling of the theater and can always be depended upon to tell the truth regarding the condition of the carbons and the way they are burning. Any one using a Motiograph machine can demonstrate this to his satisfaction in one minute, but in a mount which is fixed to the lamp house it might be necessary to drill an extra hole in the mount, and perhaps a little larger. A very little experimenting will determine the proper location of same.

I found that this condition was caused by the light being refracted from the convex side of the front condensers. This is proved by the fact that the points of each carbon as shown on the front of the booth are edged by the colon in the spectrum, and is much more pronounced when using direct than alternating current. So try this gag and if you don't think it a good one write to the editor, so that I may know about it. Next!

[As mentioned in The World for May 8, we invite short, pithy hints for this column from our operator readers—pointed, plain and practical. Send along your experiences for the benefit of all in the craft.—Editor M. P. W.]

THE DUTY ON FILMS.

The Board of United States General Appraisers decided on March 19 that cinematograph films have the right to enter this country as "photographs," dutiable at 25 per cent. ad valorem. General Appraiser Fischer, in quoting the decision of the Board, said: "That such positive is pictured on a strip of celluloid and not on a strip of paper is immaterial. In either event it is light written and therefore a photograph. To say that the method of making these pictures was not known when the act was passed and therefore could not be covered by it is to beg the question."

It is now stated, however, that the Government intends to appeal this decision, and the matter will come up before the Supreme Court between now and July; at any rate, before the Court rises. It will be interesting to know whether the Government will be successful in its appeal. The occasion is one which calls for active endeavor on the part of the film importing firms to prevent the imposition of an advanced duty.

TRADE NOTES.

Colorado Springs, Col.—Plans are under way for a new moving picture theater to be erected at the corner of Huerfano street and Nevada avenue by P. E. Hewitt and F. M. Fishback.

La Crosse, Wis.—The New Majestic Theater Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are Frank Kappleberger, W. W. Corgill, W. R. Hyde and others.

Philadelphia, Pa.—James G. Doak & Co. have been awarded the contract for the construction of a $100,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater at 917 Market street, which a syndicate, headed by George H. Earle, will erect.

Peru, Ind.—The Schiller Amusement Company, of Chicago, has leased the Wallace Theater here for moving picture purposes.

Woonsocket, R. I.—Manville Opera House, at Manville, has been purchased by John S. Blondin, of this city, and William O. McLean, of Manville, who will improve and arrange for a high class of entertainments.

NOTICE OF REMOVAL.

On account of the increasing demand for lecturettes and the immediate success of the Lecturette Library Gunby Bros. have been compelled to seek larger quarters, which are located at 199 Third avenue, New York.

They have also installed an up-to-date plant for the making of artistic film titles.

Savannah, Ga.—During the past week the Kings' Daughters gave a "Tag" day here; more than $700 was cleared. Each man, woman or child who had a ticket was let in free at the Criterion and Superba Theaters, owned by the Bandy Bros., who have become so popular of late with the people.

At the Orpheum boxes have been put in, and every night the place is crowded.

A roof garden is planned by some of Savannah's most prominent citizens. Paul Canida is at the head. The place will be built over his store, which is located on Bull street, Savannah's most popular street. Moving pictures and vaudeville will be the star features.

OHIO NEWS.

Mr. Chas. Reark, manager of Theatorium, one of the up-to-date picture theatres at Sandusky, has contracted for first-run association pictures, eight changes a week. Mr. Reark will guarantee his patrons the most select subjects of association makers. Mr. Fred Brown, operator and electrician of Theatorium, called upon a friend last week at New Castle, Pa., who is operator at the Electric in that city. Mr. Brown has had long experience in the picture line. He has invented a new flickerless shutter that has proven a success. Proprietors of moving picture theatres throughout Ohio who have visited Mr. Reark's cozy theatre state that he has the brightest and clearest pictures in the State. Ushers seat the patrons, a new light system has been installed, and no expense is spared to give the amusement goers of Sandusky the best of entertainment at this theatre for five cents admission. Mr. Reark has installed five Hallberg arc lamps, turning night into day in front of the theatre.

Mr. W. C. Kunzmann, who has been connected with the Sandusky Theatre during the season of 1908-09, will take a week's vacation, after which time he will be open to accept a position with a summer park theatre or a city theatre which will remain open all summer. Mr. Kunzmann has had wide experience managing vaudeville and picture theatres, as well as an up-to-date roller rink, and any owner of enterprises of this nature looking for a hustler will do well by addressing him at his home in Sandusky, Ohio.

The Star Theatre, Sandusky, under the management of Bumgartner & Trautlein, has secured the services of Miss Josephine Henderson to sing illustrated songs.

The Sandusky Theatre, which has been running vaudeville and pictures with a seating capacity of 1,300, has been closed to be remodeled for next season. Mr. R. P. Stoddard, the manager, will remain in Sandusky for his vacation. This theatre has had a most successful season under his management.

The Royal Theatre, under the management of Mr. Carl Bitzer, formerly vocalist at Theatorium, is without doubt the most beautiful pleasure palace in northern Ohio. It has been remodeled throughout, and new arches with white and gold trimmings have been placed in front of the theatre. Mr. Bitzer has contracted with the Kent Film Exchange for first-run service. The double dissolving stereopticon used at this theatre is a feature and something new to people in Sandusky, being the only one used in that city. The feature vaudeville act at this theatre last week was an act written by Mr. Bitzer called "Bargain Day in a Second-hand Store." It was a scream from start to finish. Mr. Bitzer took the part of a Jew, while Mr. Clyne, the lightning artist, assisted Mr. Bitzer, playing the Rube. The extra attraction at this theatre on Sunday afternoons and nights is music furnished by a three-piece orchestra.

Dear Sirs:
Your favor of the 22nd.
Not for a long time have we hit on any one who has handled an order of ours in the manner in which you are taking care of the special advertising slides, order for which was given you a short time ago.
We could not help but be pleased with the idea that you have suggested and there is no doubt in our mind whatever but our customer will be equally as well pleased with his slides as we are in having you make the suggestion.
We trust the good work will keep up.
Yours very truly,
IMPORTED FILM & SUPPLY CO.

A patron said to us recently: "No one ever produced an advertising slide worthy the name or fit for use as such until you did." We appreciate the compliment. When we commenced to spend our money and concentrate our creative impulse to the production of meritorious advertising and announcement slides, we believe the public would appreciate it, and we knew if we could arrouse honest compliments for high artistic creations, we would quickly step to the front and would deserve recognition as the standard for all others to emulate.

We believed we had the artistic impulse; we knew we had the technical training. We hoped for success.—We have the pleasure now.

No. 6468 The Legend of Sterling Keep Code, VERLES. Approximate Lengt h 1000 feet.

A romantic drama of the Twelfth Century. The scenes are laid in England. The Legend o f Sterling Keep avers that whoever shall sleep in the keep room, shall sleep fifty years, or awaken in the morning to find his road clear to a kingship. A bridegroom on the eve of his marriage to the daughter of Lord Sterling scorns the legend and sleeps in the keep room. His affianced bride with the aid of friends plays a practical joke upon him by changing the furniture, hangings and other features of the room so as to give him the impression when he awakes that fifty years have elapsed. A slab in the wall giving the date of the death of his bride adds to the deception, The bridegroom loses his mind because of the joke but in later years it is restored. A striking and beautiful picture.

RELEASED JUNE 11, 1909

No. 6469 The Boots He Couldn't Lose Code, VERLETSEL. Approximate Length, 640 feet.

Mr. Scruggles attemps to dispose of a pair of tight boots, but like the cat that came back, they return to their owner as fast as they are thrown away. The boots return unaided and as if they had life. It is an interesting reproduction of trick photography.

No. 6470 Buying Manhattan Code, VERLETRBAR. Approximate Length, 360 feet.

A splendid worked up picture descriptive of the incidents surrounding the purchase of Manhattan Island from the Indians by the Dutch. The Island is shown as it existed when the purchase was made and by way of contrast, a panoramic view is given as it is to-day.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE SON'S RETURN.—Desperation makes the parents unconscionable. Poverty palls the most generous spirits; it transforms the most humane into veritable demons and makes them dare deeds of which the mere thought would in more prosperous conditions make them quake. This Biograph subject shows to what extremes an indigent couple were driven by desperation. Will Sanderson's father kept the village inn, but Will being deeply enamored of pretty Mary Clark had aspirations above the plebeian and rather impecunious calling of village boniface, and so decided to go to the big city and fight for fortune, having read the glowing lines of the biographers of great men who invariably start them on their career as poor country lads. Bidding his sweetheart Mary a fond, but tearful farewell, he then takes his leave of his dear old parents, his mother presenting him with a miniature of herself, as a memento to guide him along the path of righteousness. He is not long in the metropolis when his bright, alert manner appeals to the manager of a banking house and he obtains employment. He had resolved not to return home until he has made a name for himself, and five years later we find him holding a position of responsibility with good salary in the concern. His appearance has somewhat changed, owing to his growing a beard, and one day, taking his mother's picture from his pocket he decides to pay them a visit. The decision is coincident with a letter he receives later during the day. It is from his sweetheart Mary and tells him of his parents' dire straits, which they, through pride, have kept from him. But as they are on the eve of eviction she asks that he help them. Back he goes with his savings, ample to relieve their difficulties, and to surprise them enters the inn and engages a room incog. He has displayed his well-filled wallet in their presence, and their extreme desperation makes them covetous. When the boy lies down for a nap the old father cannot resist, and in securing the wallet arouses the boy, and is forced to knock him on the head. Thinking he had killed his guest, he takes his inert body out and deposits him in the field under the bushes, where he is found later by Mary, who, calling help, assists him to her home nearby, he recovering from the blow on the way. Meanwhile the old couple have gone back to the inn and upon opening the wallet what a revelation—"My God, we have murdered our own boy"—they find therein the mother's picture. They are paralyzed with fear and sorrow, so in an almost maniacal condition they go to Mary's home to confess their awful deed. You may imagine their feelings when they are brought face to face with their boy, and dropping on their knees in humble contrition they thank God for the deliverance. Length, 993 feet.

HER FIRST BISCUITS.—One of the precepts in the doctrine of "How to be happy though married" is, Don't encourage wifey dear in her ambition to emulate mother in her culinary proficiency. Never make the resilient break that you would like to have pies such as mother used to make, for if you respect you digestive organs you will hire a cook and be content with what she serves you. Should your indiscretion get the better of you your helpmate will attend the cooking school, and woe is your lot. This Biograph subject is an object lesson along those lines, as Mrs. Jones with effusive enthusiasm felt that Eddie dear would appreciate her endeavors to prepare for him a batch of biscuits. That she followed the rules and directions set down in her text books is not questioned, but one bite from the leadlike disks was enough, and getting the dear little creature from the table by subterfuge he throws a full dozen of them through the window, pretending to have eaten them upon her return. Of course she is delighted at his apparent appreciation and when he has departed for the office she puts up a package of them and takes them there, placing them on his desk. Jones is not present at the time, he being in the adjoining room in the throes of indigestion. Visitors to his office, he being a theatrical agent and they hungry actors, espy the inviting looking dough boulders and partake greedily. In a short time the assemblage is a writhing, struggling, screaming mob. Meanwhile, at the Jones domicile the iceman, a housebreaker and the cop who trailed him all fall victims. Well, for a time it looked as if Mrs. Emma Jones was guilty of wholesale manslaughter. The trouble subsides, however, the victims convalesce and peace is restored when Mr. J. hurls, though with reluctance, the pernicious pabulum into the street. Length, 514 feet.

THE FADED LILIES.—"Oh, death, where is thy sting? Oh, grave, where is thy victory?" Especially over the experiencing a love-blighted life, for the power of love is compelling, and we become its abject slaves. Francois, a hunchback, high-strung musician, plays at a social gathering, and the fair debutante bestows upon him, in appreciation of his talents, a bouquet of lilies of the valley. This attention is misconstrued by Francois into a token of affection and he cherishes them as such. Upon awakening to the truth the disappointment wrecks his reason, and to help him the doctor persuades the girl to pretend affection, which she does, and consents to wear a ring he gives her. Later, upon finding the ring missing he discovers the deception and slyly changing his medicine for water thwarts the doctor's skill and slowly but stubbornly makes his way towards that "blind cave of eternal night to which we all fly for relief and lay our burdens down." Length, 481 feet.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

A RURAL TRAGEDY.—The roar and crackle of flames, the crash of falling timbers, the hoarse shouts of a frantic mob are mingled with the screams of a woman, caught apparently beyond hope of escape in the burning house, the eager fire licking almost at the very hem of her skirts, in the once seen, never-to-be-forgotten climax of this powerful drama of love and hate.

There is nothing artificial about this scene, or rather, series of scenes. The house is real, the fire is real, and when the last pathetic incident of the powerful story is enacted all that remains of the pretty country home is a mass of charred and smoking embers.

It is something to talk about, indeed, something to advertise heavily, for its like has never been shown in films before—an actual house, of no flimsy, but genuine construction, deliberately destroyed by fire, and the final portions of the story acted to the full amid such scenes of real danger. When the heroine and her brother are snatched from the very jaws of death by a daring rescue the danger is vividly true and not merely of stage construction; it is no mere sulphur smoke, but flames, a seething, roaring volume of fire, that eats and destroys before the very eyes of the audience the entire house of the family who suffer so much the tragedy of life.

In thrill, suspense and the element of genuine danger around the actors the fire scenes in this picture have no equal in any film that has ever been produced.

The story leading up to these wonderful scenes is full of strength. It tells the love of two brothers for the same girl, how she coquetted with one, but finally gave her heart to the other, yet it is the brother who loves and loses who plays the hero at the fire and saves his brother and sister from the flames at the cost of his own life.

Too much cannot be said about this picture; it will be a sensation to all who see it on the screen. Length, 1,000 feet.

HOW THE TRAMP GOT THE LUNCH.—He was a very jovial tramp, but his joviality didn't win him the luncheon he so fondly coveted. He experimented with it on the workman with the fat bundle of luncheon and quantity of beer surrounded by bucket, but the workman was decidedly blind to Handsome Harry's qualities as a good fellow. He was annoyed, if truth be said, and Harry, of the battered silk hat, felt his annoyance distinctly.

Not being able to secure a share of the food and drink by fair means he determined to secure all of it by foul, and accomplished his end. He stowed the workman, when that individual was deep in a fatal, unsuspecting moment, in a cask and literally rolled him away. The luncheon and the drink was his, but not for long. As he moved away from there, trying to perform the triple feat of eating, drinking and running at the same time, a brawny fellow-workman stopped the flight of the cask down hill, released his co-laborer from the embrace of the staves and hoops, and the tramp's enjoyment was speedily terminated. The food was spoiled, the drink was spilled, but what happened to the tramp was an excellent replica in miniature of what would have been his fate had he been caught in the very heart of a Kansas cyclone.

Handsome Harry was very glad to swiftly vanish when the workman-tornado had finished its work, and the worthy son of toil felt that he had some recompense, even though he lost his luncheon, for the troubles of a bad quarter of an hour in the barrel. Length, 160 feet.

CLOSED ON SUNDAY.—Here is one continuous volley of laughs that will make anyone who sees the film forget there is such a thing as care, that will put old Dr. Blues on the hastiest sprint he ever knew and send depression to the shelf with a bound. It's a laugh, a scream, a roar. The miser just robbed of his gold would find mirth in this film story, and the man who has been gloomy ever since Wall Street dented his purse will remember only to laugh and prove one of the merry-merry among the onlookers. If a party of relations are coming for a month's visit or the cook burned the mutton at dinner see "Closed on Sunday" and all else but laughter will be forgotten.

Bill Stebbins, a drummer with a chronic thirst, arrives at Milgeville, a copper-riveted, iron-bound Sunday town, Sunday afternoon with a parched area in his throat and an idea that nothing but something with an alcoholic stick in it will serve to irrigate that throat properly. The landlord proffers his assistance. He introduces Bill to various expedients by which the Sunday law is dodged, and Bill is always just on the point of getting his drink, but doesn't. And the way this happens is what creates the laughs. In the end, even when Bill thinks he has the drink secured beyond all possibility of accident he loses it again, and is forced to seek assuagement of his thirst in clear spring water.

Whether one is on the "dry" or the "wet" side of the fence regarding liquor the story is full of laughs and without an iota of offense. It is a clean comedy, a chain of incidents with a laugh in every one, and a climax that will induce a scream of merriment. Ably acted and skilfully directed, it is a comedy of comedies. Length, 840 feet.

ESSANY FILM MFG. CO.

TEN NIGHTS IN A BAR ROOM.—This story is based upon the celebrated drama of that title, a story stronger and more impressive than any temperance lecture ever delivered from rostrum or preached from pulpit.

The story is replete with the most thrilling and dramatic incidents, and for a full half century has enthralled and educated the vast multitude of the entire English-speaking world. It shows the terrible influence of alcohol and its curse upon those who have not the power or fortitude to combat its temptation.

Joe Morgan, an honest young workman, beloved and honored by all, a respected husband, father and friend, held in the highest esteem by his employers. His character and habits were temperate and upright. He shunned the saloon as one would shun sure death.

The story tells of his terrible downfall, when upon one day he is lured by two "friends" to take his first drink. The demon Rum takes possession of him, he becomes intoxicated and reckless, and his employer, finding him in that condition, takes him home. The wife is horrified and grief-stricken. His conscience is stirred and he resolves never again to yield to temptation. But the poison is in his nerves and the next day finds him again at the bar room. The patient wife, waiting for his return, suspects the cause of his absence and sends her little seven-year-old daughter to the saloon. Here follows a most pathetic scene. The child enters the bar as the father, in a drunken frenzy, raises a chair to strike another drunken brawler. The little one confronts him. He is sobered at once and allows the innocent little one to lead him away and take him home. More promises are made, but, of course, the demon's work is not completed. He sinks lower and lower until discharged by his employer he becomes the degraded drunkard whose constant haunt is the bar room, and the wife and child are reduced to poverty and hunger. The pitiful episode of these nights in a bar room is brought to a tragic ending. The little child enters the place to coax her father home, when in the midst of a usual bar room fight the child is struck with a large beer glass and falls senseless. Morgan is sobered again, and taking the child is his arms, staggers home with her.

He is now a nervous wreck and beneath the dreadful strain is overcome by an attack of delirium tremens. Thanks to the patience and devotion of a loving wife, he and the child are nursed back to health.

Morgan has had his lesson; it has been a bitter one and has caused much suffering, but from this sorrow and evil comes much good. The drunkard is reformed, he becomes an ardent teetotaler and temperance worker. He is re-established and advanced in his position, and we see him, several years later, united with his once more happy family, an honored man and an ornament to society.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine.)

HUNTED TO THE END.—On the terrace of a cafe a braggard boasts of his adventures to a number of his companions. A journalist in passing accidentally touches the central figure in the group and thus provokes a quarrel which results in a challenge to a duel.

At the home of the journalist, where otherwise everybody is blissfully happy, his dejected and troubled manner as he makes preparations for the future welfare of his family in the event of the encounter proving disastrous to him, are noticed by the devoted wife. She laments over the facts when she learns the details. The next day the seconds sorrowfully report the result of the encounter and the woman's grief knows no bounds as she learns she is a widow. A friend of the family vows vengeance and at every opportunity he confronts the slayer of his friend and ultimately causes his arrest and conviction. Length, 717 feet.

A PAYING BUSINESS.—A professional beggar, who has imposed upon the public by pretending to be blind, finds his income is decreasing to a very great degree and his plea for pity and aid seems to repel rather than attract the passersby.

In search of some plan by which to enlarge his receipts, he decides to appeal to the vanity of people rather than to their sympathy. He then returns to the miserable shelter, which he shares with another of his class and there explains his plan to his companion, who expresses great delight with the idea and agrees to assist in the scheme.

They secure a portion of their savings and purchase an old photographic outfit which they carry to the beggar's old stand on the public square.

Here the beggar kneels in his usual attitude of asking aid, holding his hat extended for coins. His companion impersonates a photographer, places his camera in such a position as to make it appear he is taking a picture of the beggar in his sad plight.

People who would ordinarily pass with no thought of charity, seeing what they believe an opportunity of having themselves photographed in the act of giving alms, contribute very liberally.

After gathering a very considerable harvest, the accomplices leave arm in arm rejoicing. Well rendered and excellent quality. Length, 285 feet.

THE CRY FROM THE WELL.—A young carpenter falls in love with a charming gypsy girl and seeks her hand. The poor fellow has had a sad existence with his little sister, who was of melancholic disposition.

Married life, he hopes, will bring happiness to his home and also be a blessing to the unfortunate sister. Things run smoothly for a time, but soon the wife becomes tired of the care of the little girl and conceives a desire to spirit her away. The sweet melodies of an accordion in the hands of the woman lure the girl on to the ledge of a well and the inevitable accident occurs.

Later the brother seeks, but fails to find, his sister and upon retiring he has a vision of the sad catastrophe befallen her. He forces his wife to accompany him to the well and there learns the truth of the disappearance of the poor unfortunate girl. Length, 812 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine)

THE NEW FOOTMAN.—The suitor for the hand of the general's daughter does not receive encouragement from the object of his love and resolves to win by strategy. Learning through an advertisement that the General is in need of a butler, preferably a negro, he has his beard cut and a coat of black applied to his white skin and with the conventional garb of a professional he applies. Together with another applicant (white) he is taken on probation. An anonymous letter to the General advises that a daring plot is to be executed to win his daughter and his suspicions immediately rest upon his new servants.

The colored servant is exceptionally good and the other so awkward as to cause much trouble and even precipitates a quarrel with the master from which the latter is rescued by the colored servant. In the mixup, however, the General acquires some of his servant's coloring and the entire party makes a woebegone sight. The lover is recognized and his cleverness so appeals to his sweetheart that he is accepted. Length, 569 feet.

MODERN ALGERIA.—In the oasis of Zibans, Algeria, a delightful series of views, bringing before the public eye one of the most beautiful spots of the Eastern continent.

The scenes illustrated are: 1. The Pass of Sfa. 2. Tringad, an ancient Roman colony founded by Trajan in the year 100 B. C.; a. The Road of Triumphs; b. The Temple of the Capito. 3. Biokra; a. The market; b. Arabian School; c. The Oasis. 4. Roman Baths; Hot Water Springs. 5. Sidi Okba. 6. Among the Palm Trees. 7. The Governor's Visit. 8. Native Jubilee. Length, 396 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THE DOG DETECTIVE.—An elderly man receives a note from his lawyer requesting him to come immediately to the latter's office and receive a check for a large sum of money which has been bequeathed him. He starts for the place accompanied by his man servant, and the latter, knowing the nature of his master's errand, steals away while waiting for him and informs a gang of thugs of the good opportunity to rob the old fellow. They come to the place and wait until the man comes out, whereupon they attack him, and, after binding him hand and foot, they put him into a carriage and drive to an isolated hut on the outskirts of the town, where they make the old fellow a prisoner. The servant, feigning fear, returns to the house where he gives the alarm to the distracted family. The victim's daughter goes to the police and informs them of the state of affairs, but is unable to throw any light on the trail of the culprits. Immediately the officers get on the job of ferreting out the hiding place of the toughs. Having a dog with keen instinct, they utilize him, and after letting the animal get the scent from the victim's coat, they put him on the trail. The intelligent dog leads them a merry chase for a long distance until finally he arrives at the hut, where he jumps in through a cellar window and finds the old man tied up. The animal tugs at the rope until the knots give way, after which he returns to the policemen, who give him a revolver which he carries in his mouth to the imprisoned man. The policemen lie in waiting and soon the robbers come along and go down to the prisoner, who, at an opportune moment, pulls the gun and holds his captors at bay, forcing them to retreat into the hands of the officers, who hurry the ruffians to the station while the happy old man pats the noble dog and shows his deep appreciation for the services he has rendered. Length, 659 feet.

CUPID'S FOUR DARTS.—In this beautifully colored film we are presented with an interesting fairy tale and see little Cupid receiving his limited amount of darts to go forth into the world and bring happiness into the hearts of those whom he aims at. The first one he meets is a cruel father and when he fires one of his darts at the man, immediately he is transformed into a most lovable being and showers his affections upon every one. The same thing happens when he strikes a cruel mother; then a child who is cruel to a little dog. Finally he exhausts his supply by piercing the heart of a cool lover who is forever quarreling with his sweetheart, but after the first shot he changes completely and is kind and loving to his fair one. An old couple are desirous of receiving the love

What was thought impossible has been accomplished
New Independent American Made Films Can Now Be Obtained

This is the result of our untiring efforts for the Independent cause and the films we have secured are not only the very highest class, but those that appeal more to the public than any other American Made Films. They are the products of the Phoenix, Tiger and Carson factories and consist of subjects portraying the most interesting scenes in every day American Life. Foremost among them are:

WESTERN PICTURES

Not the kind usually exhibited, but an entirely different class that show real life on the plains, such as The Indian Mail Carrier, Russian Romance, A Conspiracy, Victim of a Crisis; anyone of which will pack your house.

INSIST UPON GETTING SUCH FILMS THROUGH YOUR EXCHANGE

If you can't—write us and we'll furnish them. The above subjects have just been released, others will be released weekly. It is this class of American Films, together with the European goods we are constantly releasing that enables us to furnish a films service you never before thought possible to obtain. Send for synopsis of both our New European and American Films.

THE RECKONING. Film D'Art.—In this wonderful picture the public enjoys the privilege of witnessing one of the greatest pieces of acting ever presented on the screen.

We have been fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Krause, who is one of the foremost dramatic actors on the French stage to-day. (At the present time he is playing the part of Flambeau as leading man for Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in L'Asglon.) In this silent drama he plays the role of the injured husband, the central figure of the piece, and being a gifted actor and finished artist, displays great intelligence in handling the part, enthralling his spectators and holding their interest to the very last.

The opening scene of the drama reveals the interior of the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. Martin, who are holding a reception for their many friends. Mr. Martin, the young husband, has heart trouble and is therefore somewhat of an invalid and unable to go about to any extent with his pleasure-loving wife. The latter, nevertheless, manages to enjoy herself and does not lack admirers. One of her male acquaintances in particular has made quite an impression on the vain little woman with his many attentions and complimentary speeches and we see him there to-night among the other guests at the Martins' home. All at once the young husband becomes indisposed, and not wishing to disturb his friends, retires to a secluded spot and endeavors to conquer his weakness. He partakes of some refreshments and tries to smoke a cigar, hoping to ward off the attack, but his efforts are in vain and he soon collapses and falls heavily to the floor. A servant passing through the room sees the master of the house as he lies there helpless and, becoming terrified, gives the alarm. Soon all the guests rush into the the room and when they see the condition of affairs they hurriedly take their departure, leaving the young wife and her admirer alone with the apparently lifeless body of their host. The youth pours words of sympathy into his companion's ear and in a few minutes we see them in a tender embrace, evidently relieved that there is now no obstacle to their union. At this juncture Martin regains consciousness and takes in the situation at a glance, but is too weak to give any sign. The lovers are so taken up with each other that they have not noticed that the man has come to. Mrs. Martin now leaves the room to change her gown and her companion remains to watch. He covers the face of the still figure beside him with a handkerchief and then turning in his chair, so as to avoid the gruesome sight, settles himself to read.

Presently the sick man summons his strength and, seeing his rival seated near, he tries in vain to arise, but is unable. Convulsively he drags himself from his position and crawls like a fiend across the room to the spot where his false guest is seated, reading. Although his body is drooped with pain and shuddering with horror, the enraged man manages to stand on his feet, then, without warning, he seizes his rival round the throat with a grip of steel and strangles him to death. The deed accomplished, he throws himself exhausted into the chair which but a moment ago his victim occupied. Presently the wife enters the room, and thinking that it is her lover still seated there, she comes toward him with open arms, but great is her horror when she discovers that it is her husband, who jumps to his feet, and seizing the terrified woman, forces her to press her lips to the distorted face of her dead lover. Length, 666 feet.

STRENUOUS SNEEZER.—A man suffering from a severe cold in his head has his own share of troubles, caused by his constant sneezing, which is of such a strenuous nature that he knocks over everything in his path. He is going along the street when he sneezes violently, and blows over a lamp post; then a man gets in his way and with a good whiff he is knocked down also, and so he continues, making life unendurable for everyone, until he finally gets back to his room. One heavy sneeze then brings the ceiling down on top of his head, and he falls in a helpless heap on the floor. Length, 269 feet.

MIXED IN HIS DINNER DATES.—This very funny picture shows a fellow who is seated in his home when suddenly he remembers that he has an engagement to take dinner with a friend, and mixing his dates he mixes his viands to his undoing. Length, 623 feet.

LOOKING FOR HIS UMBRELLA.—A man receives an umbrella from his wife as a birthday present, and shortly after he starts out to have a good time, but absentmindedly he carries a cane which he loses and thinks it is the umbrella. Length, 361 feet.

POOR LITTLE KIDDIES.—A little boy, the son of wealthy parents, goes down to the seashore with his governess and while the latter stops to talk with a friend, the young rascal steals away and going to the water's edge he climbs into a small boat to have a little sport. Soon, however, the tide takes the frail craft out to sea, and the little fellow not having the strength to manage the boat calls for aid. A couple of gypsies on the shore hear his cries and one of them dives in and swims out to the child and rows him safely to shore. The fellow who is waiting, upon seeing the fine little fellow, takes him in his arms and hurries off to the camp, although the youngster tries hard to escape from his clutches. The little fellow is stripped of his fine clothing and dressed in the conventional gypsy garb, after which he is put to work with the other children to make his living.

One day about six months later the boy and one of the little girls from the camp are going along the street selling baskets, when all at once the youngster catches sight of his parents driving by in a carriage. They leave their wares and start in pursuit of the rig and after running for a long distance the little girl becomes exhausted and falls on the road, but the boy keeps up the chase. Finally he catches up to the rig and rushes up to his overjoyed parents, who take him in their arms and after an effusive greeting he is again taken to his old home. He then informs his parents of his little companion's plight and immediately the maid is sent out to find the child, which she soon does and bringing the little one to the beautiful home, she is made one of the happy family to grow up as a sister to the little boy whom she has grown attached to. Length, 443 feet.

GOOD BIRTHDAY PRESENT.—This comedy which abounds with many funny situations shows us a fellow who receives a note from the express office, stating that there is a large case in their possession which he must come and claim at once. It being his birthday, he naturally jumps at the conclusion that it is a present from some relative, so forthwith he hires a large cart and goes after the box. What is in it and how he gets it home makes rich comedy. Length, 338 feet.

MAKING LACE.—This is an exceptionally interesting picture, inasmuch as it gives a very vivid idea of the lace industry in the country provinces of France, where the people are noted for their beautiful hand-made lace which is such an important acquisition to feminine attire. We see the little girls who are taught the art very young and some of their specimens are indeed wonderfully artistic and beautiful. Length, 197 feet.

MAYER SILVERMAN
322 Fulton Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Osman Bey, a Turkish nobleman, desires the hand of this charming girl. He has expressed his love for her to her father, who is an ambitious, worldly man and who aspires to obtain that social recognition which is so dear to the average man of wealth. Mons. Dupont is well aware that he is selling his daughter, and so cleverly does he arrange matters by pretending that he is facing financial ruin, that he persuades Flora into giving her consent to the marriage in order to save his credit.

Several months later, whilst sightseeing in Constantinople, Jack by accident meets Flora, who is driving in a closed vehicle. He is startled at the change in her appearance and indignant over the revelation of her misery and ill-treatment. Almost a prisoner in the house of Osman Bey, she is denied friends and relatives. Her one great desire now is to get away from her tyrannical and brutal husband. Jack determines to aid her, and tells her that he will gain admittance to the grounds of the palace after sundown, where he may talk with her and if possible formulate a plan whereby she may gain her freedom.

True to his word Jack is on hand at the appointed time, but is unable to pass the guards at the gate. Nothing daunted, this daring American determines to scale the massive walls, which he does after a great deal of difficulty. Making his way through the beautiful gardens, he manages to see through a lighted window Flora's face and form. Gently tapping on the pane of glass her attention is attracted, but a female spy, ordered by Osman Bey to keep an eye on his wife, observes the signal from the window and immediately acquaints her master with the knowledge of his wife's indiscretion. Burning with rage, the infuriated husband summons his slaves and orders them to take the American prisoner. Jack has just greeted Flora, when he is startled by a sharp word of command, and turning suddenly he is seized by the stalwart slaves of the palace and dragged away. Flora appeals to her enraged husband for Jack's release, taking all the blame on herself, but to no avail.

The prisoner is carried to an underground dungeon, where he is left to ponder over the perplexing situation in which he now finds himself. Maddened by grief, the poor girl determines in her desperation to go to the Sultan and beg his clemency. Escaping from her chamber window she makes her way to the Sultan's palace, and gaining admittance is granted an audience by his majesty. Struck by her beauty and fired by the crafty thought that he might gain this helpless woman for his harem, he promises her the pardon, but instead of letting her take it he despatches one of his officers with the papers, at the same time commanding the bewildered Flora to remain at his palace.

How Jack is led out to execution and how the pardon arrives just in time to save his life, much to the chagrin of Osman Bey, is all vividly shown. Jack has learned of Flora's detention in the Sultan's palace, and so embittered is he at this outrage that he joins the cause of the revolutionists.

The last scenes of the picture show the attack on the Sultan's palace, and the meeting of Osman Bey and Jack in a hand to hand conflict in which the Turk is bested, which is followed by the rescue of Flora and the capture of the despised Sultan.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE FOUNDLING.—Ruth, the daughter of John Hodgson, a merchant in a small provincial town, has been betrayed and tempted away from home. The man dies before he can make reparation for the wrong, and Ruth, left alone with the child a few months old, writes to her father beseeching him to forgive her and take her home. She returns home with her baby, a little girl, but the old man sternly refuses to have anything to do with her and casts her out with the child to beg or to starve. Ruth wanders out into the cold and snow at a loss what to do. Presently she sees the stage door of a theater open. Here she can at least get warmth and protection for her baby. She goes inside, leaves the baby in a dressing room and departs. John Redmond, who occupies the dressing room, finds the baby and adopts it. A few years later we are shown Redmond and the child enjoying a Summer holiday. In the meanwhile Ruth has gone on the stage, and in the course of a few years has risen to some rank in her profession. By a strange turn of fate she joins the same company with Redmond. He falls in love with her and wants her to marry him. Thinking of her past she refuses. Later on she meets the child, hears the strange story of its adoption and recognizes it as her own. She tells Redmond. He again asks her to be his wife and this time she consents. Length, 1,000 feet.

THE PLOT THAT FAILED.—An old farmer and his wife are sitting at the table. He is reading a paper in which an advertisement meets his gaze. He shows it to his wife and they at once decide to purchase the farm described. They get ready and at once leave for the agents. At about the same time two prospectors examine the farm, find indications of rich ore, congratulate themselves upon their discovery and start immediately for the agents to secure the property. The farmer, however, reaches there first, pays over his money, gets the necessary documents and is ready to leave when the speculators enter. They are disappointed in not being able to secure the property, offer to buy the farm at a substantial increase but are refused. A week later the two men make the farmer a visit, offer him a large amount for the property and are again refused. Coming outside, they plan to scare the old man into disposing of the farm. That night, when the old couple have retired, the two men rig themselves up as ghosts, tap on the bedroom window and succeed in frightening the new owners almost to death. The next morning the old man, in looking about the place, notices footprints near the window. He is convinced that somebody is playing a joke on him, goes at once to a hardware store, purchases a large bear trap and that night sets it near the window. The couple are awakened from their sleep by the taps on the window. The taps are immediately followed by terrific yells. The old farmer jumps up, grabs his gun and rushes outside, where he finds the speculator fast in the trap. The schemer begs for mercy, the farmer finally releases him and gives him a good kick as he runs away. Length, 485 feet.

A MAKER OF DIAMONDS.—In a poorly furnished room a crippled girl is seated at the table writing, her mother preparing the meal and occasionally glancing at the window as if expecting someone. Presently the father, Mr. Von Bellen, a chemist, enters, sits at the table in deep thought. Suddenly he jumps up, goes to the laboratory, closes and locks the door, then goes through the process of making diamonds, finishing by taking several from the condenser. He rushes excitedly from the laboratory into the living room and shows the diamonds to his wife and daughter. They cannot believe them genuine, so Von Bellen takes one, gives the others to his wife and starts out to dispose of the gem. He walks down the street until he comes to the office of a diamond broker, where he enters. The dealer examines the stone, is satisfied of its genuineness and buys it. He is, however, somewhat suspicious and sends his clerk to follow the old chemist. Von Bellen returns home, gives the money to his wife, then goes to his laboratory and makes a still larger diamond. The clerk watches the process through the window, returns to his employer and reports and they determine to wreck the laboratory. While the chemist is out shopping the clerk enters through the window

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph 1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

A DRAMA AT MESSINA (Dramatic), (Stella).—Many were the dramas and tragedies enacted in the town of Messina, resting at the foot of Vesuvius, when, without warning, that volcano erupted and split the earth for many miles about and destroyed a great number of villages and cities, often engulfing all their inhabitants. This drama is laid in Messina the day before and the day after its destruction. A scene is then given of an improvised hospital, where a girl is searching among the wounded men. At last she finds her lover, and the meeting between them is indeed pathetic.

TOO CLEAN A SERVANT (Comedy), (Eclair).—If you have been troubled with unsatisfactory servants and should be walking along the street and should see a maid servant down on her knees scrubbing the sidewalk, after having rubbed the marble steps of a house into immaculate whiteness, wouldn't you wish to engage the girl on the spot? That's the way Mr. and Mrs. Smith felt about it, and they engaged the girl, to their sorrow. The moral is that a servant may specialize on scrubbing and know nothing else of the servant curriculum.

WEARY WILLIE WHEELING (Comedy), (Wrench).—Weary Willie is discovered asleep in the tall grass. A young lady, picking flowers, wanders near him. He is awakened by the sound of her footsteps, and, jumping up, snatches her pocketbook and runs away. The next scene shows a man on a wheel riding along a lonely country road. He selects a quiet spot in which to rest and eat his lunch. He dismounts, removes his coat and hat, and begins to eat from a lunch box, but soon falls asleep. Weary Willie appears, exchanges hats and coats with the unknowing sleeper, eats his lunch, mounts his wheel and rides away. Then the chase begins. Willie finally encounters an artist, who sits painting a picture in an open field. All of Willie's victims are close upon his heels. He gets tangled up with the wheel and the artist's easel, which gives his pursuers an opportunity of catching up with and arresting him.

ONLY A DART (Comedy), (Walturdaw).—Little Johnny is presented with an air gun which shoots darts. His doting parents set up a target in the parlor and leave Johnny to practice with his gift. Johnny is not a very good marksman, and several of the darts find their way into a handsome oil painting. The housemaid endeavors to drive Johnny out, but arrives in time to receive a misdirected dart in her cheek. Johnny then saunters into the highway, armed with his trusty weapon. His first victim is an old man pushing a wheelbarrow; the next is an old woman on her way to market, who receives a misdirected dart in her leg. The village curate, sauntering along the cathedral path in deep meditation, is the next victim. A dude, stopping to talk to a policeman, is joined by a man carrying a pail of milk. A dart pierces this pail and a stream squirts out and ruins the dude's trousers. Then the chase begins. Johnny is captured at last and a court scene is given, in which the little rascal is confronted by all his victims. The judge believes that Johnny can shoot straight if he wants to, so His Honor holds up a target. The dart misses the target and hits the judge in the face. That is Johnny's finish, and he is soundly spanked before the court.

THE BIRTH OF A BIG GUN (Educational), (Cricks & Martin).—Millions of dollars yearly are spent by the governments of the world in the manufacture of deadly weapons. This series of views, taken by the courtesy of Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth & Co., Ltd., Newcastle-on-Tyne, shows the manufacture of the big guns used on warships and for coast defense, from the time the pig iron is delivered at the foundry until the finished product is tested. These are intimate views, taken at close range. The first view shows the workmen "charging" a furnace with running metal. Then the casting of steel ingots is shown. The following picture shows an ingot weighing eighty-four pounds. Then the making of a twenty-ton iron casting. A gun barrel under hydraulic power is then seen. Following this, a gun barrel is seen in the process of being "shaved" by monster hydraulic planes. The barrel of the gun is then turned and a picture is given of a shaving one-half inch thick. A view of the gun barrel coming out of a furnace red-hot, to be tempered; the barrel, being dipped into the oil well for tempering, and a picture of the crew boring a "jacket" for a twelve-inch gun is shown. How wire is used in winding the covering of the big guns is explained by the following picture. The gun in the picture is of 50 caliber. A number of giant cranes are then seen, "shrinking" the jacket of the gun. Then an immense auger is shown "rifling" the big war weapon. The breach end of the gun is seen in operation. From this point a general view of the shops is given, from which each department is seen. A completed breach is shown, together with a near view of its mechanism. The final views of the series show the testing of the finished product—a twelve-inch gun—on proved ground.

From an educational standpoint this is undoubtedly one of the most intensely interesting series of views offered in many years.

A FALSE FRIEND (Dramatic), (Walturdaw).—A man and wife are shown in the beautiful garden surrounding their palatial home, enjoying a cup of tea. A military friend calls upon them and is invited to join them at the garden table. The husband finds his supposed friend making love to his wife and slaps the friend upon the cheek, which is an invitation to duel. The wife arrives at the duelling place in time to see her husband killed. By his death, the wife is reduced to poverty. A scene in the home of the friend is then shown. He is filled with remorse for the killing of the man and the poverty-stricken condition in which it has placed the widow. He sends her a check for $15,000. At first she is inclined to refuse this, but when she considers her children, she decides to accept.

THE SPECIAL LICENSE (Dramatic), (Hepworth).—A lady is shown seated on a park bench. A horseman arrives and attempts to make love to her. She is rescued by a man in an automobile, who falls in love with her. He calls upon her at her home, but her father disapproves the match. He goes to a priest, however, and arranges for a special license to marry. The trysting place is arranged. The rival lover overhears the plans and determines to outwit the more successful suitor. On his way home the automobile of the successful suitor is waylaid by a pair of highwaymen. He is carried to a lonely place in the woods and tied to a tree. The rival dons his coat and assumes a false moustache to appear like the successful suitor. He then goes away in the automobile. Meanwhile the two confederate highwaymen quarrel over the money which has been paid them. During the quarrel the lover cuts the ropes which tie him to the tree, escapes upon the other man's horse and starts in pursuit of the automobile. He arrives at the church in time to interrupt the false wedding. The father arrives and forgives the lover who has saved his daughter and the originally planned wedding takes place.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SEA (Dramatic), (Raleigh & Robert).—Scenes along the English coast are shown as an introductory to this story of the sea. Fishermen are seen hauling in their nets. A bottle is found, which contains a message to the effect that a boat has been wrecked and that the survivors are stranded on a certain island out at sea. One of the fishermen hurries with this message to the maritime office and he is at once dispatched with a crew to locate the survivors. The boat starts on its journey of rescue and is seen far out at sea. Finally it comes across the survivors, who are in a yawl, without compass, and tossed at the mercy of the waves. The survivors are rescued. The fishermen congratulate the rescuers and the scenes of the home port art then given and the story ends happily.

SKI RUNNERS OF THE ITALIAN ARMY (Educational), (Aquila).—This is another of the "Italian Army Series," which have thus far shown the cavalry, navy and artillery in action. The "Ski Runners" is as excitingly interesting as any of its predecessors and demonstrates the wonderful skill in the use of the "foot-sleds" which is possessed by this branch of the standing army of Italy. As in the cavalry and artillery films, so in this—the men are put to the most hazardous tests. They are first introduced leaving the barracks, where the skis have been tied to their feet. They begin their sliding march through the snow-laden forests. They are shown climbing precipitous mountains, from the top of which they descend, single file, on their skis. There are many near-tragedies. Several of the brave runners turn complete somersaults in their descent. Others fall and narrowly escape being crushed to death by an oncoming comrade. They are shown jumping high obstacles. One ski run made is down the side of a mountain at an angle of forty-five degrees, where the descent is perhaps a half-mile in length.

This is, no doubt, one of the greatest films of the year.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF A BAD ACTION (Dramatic), (Lux).—A business man, who has become a millionaire by reason of grinding down his men and being hard-hearted, is asked by his assistant bookkeeper for leave of absence. The assistant bookkeeper is very ill. The business man replies that he cannot afford to employ sick people and the assistant bookkeeper is discharged. He returns home to his wife and child, where, after a short illness, he dies. The wife is forced to become a beggar. The next scene shows a big vault in the home of the millionaire. This vault contains a secret lock and its location is known only to the men who constructed it. Here the rich man finally enters with a grip full of bonds and gold. While he is hiding this away, he imagines he hears someone coming and he shuts the door. When he is ready to depart, he discovers he has lost his keys. The acting of the millionaire from this point on is splendid. He realizes that he must remain in this vault and starve to death amid all his wealth. Once he is confronted with the apparition of the dead bookkeeper. The millionaire begs the man's forgiveness, but as he does so the apparition fades. The millionaire goes mad and finally dies.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC'S ADVENTURES (Dramatic), (Lux).—Rostand was among the first of dramatists to celebrate the stirring adventures of Cyrano de Bergerac, sometimes called "The Long-Nosed Hero." Richard Mansfield made the character famous in America by his inimitable acting of it. In this film story, some of the most stirring incidents of Cyrano's life are shown. The first scene shows Cyrano bidding an affectionate farewell to his brother. He meets a number of friends in the street and one of these makes fun of his long nose. Cyrano promptly offers to fight him. The challenge is accepted. Cyrano is recommended for the King's service. A duel scene in a typical street of the time is then given. Cyrano, accompanied by two of his "trusties," meets his opponent, who is accompanied by a pair of worthies, and the rapier fight begins in earnest. The flash of the swords in the moonlight, the desperation of the combatants in the narrow street thrill the blood of the spectator. Cyrano and his party are victorious. The interior of the Tavern of the Cadets is shown, where the swashbuckling daredevils of Cyrano's time foregathered to plan their robberies. A conspiracy is seen "in the hatching." Cyrano learns that the conspirators are about to waylay a palanquin containing a wealthy lady. Cyrano arrives at the scene of the hold-up in the nick of time and disposes of the half-dozen or more robbers, single-handed. He and the lady fall in love. He calls at her home, but before their love is declared he is called away to war. The battle scene which follows is not only exciting, but extremely picturesque. Cyrano is the victor on the field. He returns home and readily wins the consent of his lady fair. However, during his absence, a rival has been endeavoring to win the lady's hand. This rival, seeing that Cyrano is the favored one, plots his death. He has a vassal waylay him. Cyrano is struck down by the culprit's club and is carried into the Tavern of the Cadets, where his sweetheart, having heard of the plot against him, arrives in time to bid him an affectionate farewell as he expires.

For costuming, scenic effects and excellent action this film will rank with the foremost products of the year.

LAKES OF KILLARNEY (Pictorial), (Paul).—This series of views will bring home to many an audience the celebrated Irish lakes to which the tourists on their horses as they are riding through nually. The Lakes of Killarney are ranked among the beauty spots of the world, and in this motion picture the most exquisite views about the famous Killarney Lakes have been captured by an excellent photographer. The first scenes show a party of aurists on their horses as they are riding through the Irish villages in and around the lakes. Scenes of Dinis Island and the boating on one of the lakes —the Lover Lake—as well as magnificent distance views of Torc Mountain, rising into the clouds, are given in green tint. The Gap of Dunloe, the Torc Waterfall, and a party of tourists shooting the rapids in two boats, in which a crash is narrowly averted, form an interesting conclusion for this series.

CINGALESE VILLAGE (Educational), (Hepworth).—Scenes in Ceylon, showing the natives in their various occupations. The curious thatched roof houses of the Cingalese are shown—with pigs running loose "in the front yard." The final scenes show the native magicians performing some of the tricks for which they have gained a renown throughout the world. Many of the views are beautifully tinted.

THE MAN HOUSEMAID (Comedy), (Cricks & Martin).—The waiting maid in a prominent family, in attempting to enter the dining room, falls down with a tray full of dishes, and in trying to catch herself she pulls down a table containing some valuable china. She is at once discharged by the master and the mistress, and, in looking over the newspaper for another maid, they find an advertisement of a man housemaid, and the husband goes off at once to an employment agency and engages the man. The man housemaid is introduced into the kitchen, where the wife, in showing him how to tie an apron on, embraces him. He falls in love with her without her knowledge. The wife then wants him to dust the floor, but he is too busy smoking good cigars and drinking the master's wine to do his allotted work. He next is seen making a bed, with the assistance of the wife. Next he attempts to make a fire and gets his face full of soot, which the wife washes off for him. He begins to make desperate love to her. Just then the husband arrives home, and catching the man housemaid by the back of the neck he throws him out and starts off after him with the intention of having him arrested. The man housemaid eludes the husband and re-enters at the window, while the husband, attempting to follow him, gets caught in the sash. The man housemaid stops long enough to bid the wife an affectionate farewell and then the husband enters. The man housemaid escapes and the wife begs forgiveness.

THE MAN WITH HIS HEAD CUT OFF (Comedy), (Stella).—A tramp, wandering along a country road, conceives a scheme for obtaining a much-needed bite to eat. He enters a nearby village and seeing a tailor's dummy with a wooden head, he steals the head. Later he steals a saw. Then he goes out into the fields again. He sees a peasant coming along with two baskets full of food. The tramp lays the wooden head down in the path and stands the saw beside it. Then he pulls his coat over his own head, to make it appear that his head has been sawed off. The peasant arrives, is horrified by the sight, and, putting down his two baskets, he hurries away for assistance. Meanwhile, however, the tramp arises, steals the two baskets of food and runs away. He finds a secluded spot in a lonely field and sits down to indulge himself with all the good things which the two baskets contain. But his enjoyment is interrupted by a party of farmers, who have been summoned by the peasant. Armed with pitchforks, they march the tramp away to the village lockup.

ACHILL'S ROCKY SHORES (Pictorial), (Paul).—A pictorial masterpiece, for which, perhaps, no more beautiful and picturesque land could have been chosen than the famous island of Achill. Scenes along the rocky coast, where the sea beats itself into a lathery foam; views of the famous cathedral, many of which are splendidly tinted; boating scenes on the dangerous rock-ribbed coast, and pictures of the cliffs are arranged in excellent sequence calculated to win and hold the enthusiastic interest of any audience.

HOW JONES GOT A NEW SUIT (Comedy), (Cricks & Martin).—Jones returns home after a "night with the boys." He has much difficulty in finding the keyhole. He removes his shoes so as to enter his bedroom without disturbing his wife. But his wife has been anxiously awaiting him for some hours, as well as the family dog. When Jones attempts to enter the bedroom he stumbles over his own feet, which arouses the dog, who in turn arouses Mrs. Jones. Mrs. Jones promptly administers a severe beating to the late arriving Jones, and, finally getting him into bed, she conceives the idea of punishing him further by taking his clothes and pawning them, which she does. When Jones awakens he discovers that both wife and clothes are missing. He calls the dog and explains that he must have some clothes. The dog starts out and is first seen taking a hat from a man who is standing talking to a friend with his hat in his hand. The dog brings the hat to Jones. Next the dog goes up to a tailor shop and steals a dummy which is fully dressed in a suit of clothes. This he brings to his master. Then the dog visits a shoe shop and steals a pair of shoes. Then Jones and the dog start out for a promenade, but the dog runs away and finds its mistress, whom it follows. All the dog's victims, seeing the dog following Mrs. Jones, believe she is the cause of the thefts, and hence she is arrested, at which the husband feels sufficiently revenged.

IN QUEST OF HEALTH (Walturdaw).—That a man may be doctored to death is readily conceded by those who have depended too much upon doctors and less upon their own natural resources for the regaining of their weakened or pain ridden bodies. This shows a business man in his office suffering from a pain in his back, a friend appears and offers him a remedy. He accepts the pills but believing that if the prescribed dose will help him a little the entire box will do him more good, he consequently takes the entire box at one fell swoop and as a result he suffers a pain in his stomach as well as the original pain in his back. He goes home where his women folks, assisted by trained nurses, carry him to bed and after a severe rubbing put a huge mustard plaster on his back. In order to avoid the terrific pain of this plaster he jumps into the bath tub. He is next shown at the door of an open air sanitorium. He

THE CONVICT FOR LIFE.—James is getting married and all the village is taking part in the festivities. One year expires—a year of work, contentment and happiness. We see the happy mother tending her babe, when a rich farmer, who formerly used to torment her with his lovemaking, pays her a most unexpected visit. He begins at once in his old way and even tries to kiss her. Just then James enters, and in his anger rushes at the rascal and throws him out into the street. Unfortunately he falls so unluckily, that he has only time to tell the neighbors who are hurrying to his assistance, who has killed him, before he expires.

James is sentenced to penal servitude for life. The punishment has to be expiated in the prison where his brother is inspector.

During the first dark and miserable night in prison the door of his cell opens and the brother comes in. He has made up his mind to save his unfortunate brother and restore him to life and liberty. He himself will pay the penalty of the committed crime.

Victor takes possession of his brother's cell, and during a short, restless sleep he sees in a dream his brother's return and the happiness of the little home.

But punishment for brotherly love gaining victory over duty is death. Victor is shot in the prison yard in the presence of all his brother officials. While dying he sees as in a vision his brother and his wife showing his picture, which hangs on the wall in the little room, to their little child.

EPISODE OF THE CUBAN WAR.—A vivid drama with the plot in Cuba at a time when our boys had gone forth to the defense of their country when the insolent conduct of Spain had resulted in the sinking of the Maine. Col. Hansomfellow unwittingly, at a gay and festal affair, attracted the fancies of a Cuban senorita, who disclaims all of the vows made to one of her own countrymen, which arouses his jealousy and starts a feud which terminates in the sacrifice of her own life.

THE HOBO'S DREAM.—A comedy which will be enjoyed by all Americans acquainted with the characteristics of the American hobo.

DON JUAN; OR, A WAR DRAMA OF THE 18TH CENTURY.—Don Juan is the typical Don Juan of literature painted so strongly by the masterly Byron, who finds time amidst the trials and tribulations of warfare to loosen the leashes of his heart and pay court to the lassies of the countryside. Yet despite the apparent uncertainties of mind and heart our hero has proven the courage and virtue of a mind capable of love in defense of a woman in a land that lay under the siege of the enemy's guns.

A story strong of action, faithful in its interpretation of horrifying and thrilling episodes of an invading army, photographically superb, actors and costnmes in a manner characteristic of the French. A remarkable production, destined to be a feature film from ocean to ocean.

LOVE WINS: A Romantic Love Story of the Far West and East.—Mary Harding and Frank Manley love each other and the old folks agree that they shall marry.

A week later a mining expert, accompanied by Devoe, a stockholder, while prospecting, finds a rich vein of silver ore on the Harding farm. Frank witnesses this discovery and follows the two men to the farm house just in time to prevent the Hardings from selling their farm with its hidden treasures for a paltry sum of money. After a fierce fight Frank dstroys the bill of sale and the Hardings are the possessors of a fortune. Devoe has been attracted by the beauty of Mary and he determines to win her and the wealth that will be hers.

The next day Devoe calls and so turns the mother's head with his attention to herself and Mary that when Frank calls the scheming mother tells him that now they are rich "Mary can marry a better man." Poor Mary surrenders to her scheming mother and becomes betrothed to Devoe.

The wedding day finds Mary bedecked in bridal finery, but most unhappy. Meanwhile, Frank has come for an explanation from his sweetheart. The English butler who orders him away is thrown down the stairway and Frank enters to find Devoe, who insolently bids him leave the house. Frenzied by such treatment, Frank knocks Devoe down and the two men have a terrific fight, which is interrupted by the entrance of the father with Mary's note. Frank dashes out to find her. The old man follows.

Back in the old home once more, Mary in her old gingham dress needs only one thing to make her perfectly happy, that is Frank, who enters, and then—Old Father enters with the minister, who marries the couple.

WARNING TO EXHIBITORS

DO not be intimidated by the latest trust circular, this time in the form of a letter, issued by a firm of attorneys to give it the semblance of legality. The trust must issue a circular every month in an endeavor to force the exhibitors to submit to its dictates, which up to the present time it has found impossible. The trusts knows full well that it dare not interfere with International Projecting & Producing Co. film, and exhibitors and exhanges need have no fear as far as our film is concerned. To those handling other film we cannot guarantee protection, but we will legally defend an interference with International Projecting & Producing Co. film.

Advise us promptly if any attempt is made by trust agents to intimidate users of OUR GOODS in any way.

the finest of the world's products—to bother with you. Can't be annoyed. He further says that the Independents are "making good" with Trust film secured before going Independent. What a joke. We only use their film for our very cheapest service, and if you can use them and will write us, we will rent you Six reels a week for $20.00, and allow you to sub-rent to one other exhibitor and allow you to earn whatever you can get; also will allow you one-half of rentals on all extra customers you get in addition to the first one. Isn't that getting money pretty easy. This offer is only good from our Chicago office.

Do you notice our price offerings on supplies and accessories. And remember we handle only the best quality of supplies.

WE HANDLE ALL MAKES OF MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

See the back page in this issue guaranteeing protection to exhibitors using Independent film. The International Producing & Projecting Co. also add their tremendous weight of legal talent to the disposal of exchanges and exhibitors using their films. Exhibitor—stand pat—pay no attention to any so-called precedents of suits gained by the Trust. I will show you before long where they have in all cases manufactured a "Dummy" film plant or theatre—brought suit and got confession of judgment from them by crooked use of the courts.

If you are a Liberty-Loving Man and not a Mouse—Stand Pat—and let us go to a finish with the blood-sucking Trust.

Mr. Exhibitor:

You will receive a letter directed to you by a firm of New York lawyers representing the Motion Picture Patents Co., commonly known as the Trust, suggesting that you are liable to become a party to an infringement Action and Injunction Proceedings.

Our inference is that they are in desperation endeavoring to force you into patronizing the so-called Film Trust and fearing that any of the exhibitors using Independent film or prospective users of Independent film are liable to be intimidated by such tactics, we have organized a NATIONAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION and have retained the services of the best legal talent available. The object of this Association is not only to defend and to protect all of its members, but likewise extend its good offices and legal services without charge to any user of Independent film patronizing its members.

We are confident that a concerted action at this time will call this latest bluff of the so-called Film Trust and put a stop to its harassing methods. We will not only be able to protect the interests of members and exhibitors using Independent film, but we invite definite action against us or any of our members by the Trust. This is to be a National body and we invite the legitimate Independent Film Exchanges to become members. A call for a National Convention will be issued in the near future.

Whether you decide to become a member or to act independently of it, our Secretary will, at all times, be pleased to furnish exchanges and moving picture exhibitors with any information they may desire in connection with this movement.

We request the Independent Exhibitors who may be annoyed in any manner by the Trust representatives to get in connection immediately with our Temporary Secretary providing him with full details.

"Have You A Little White Elephant In Your Home?"

I want you to remember one thing always, namely, that I built up the biggest and best film renting business in the world by catering to the so-called "little fellows." In others words I owe my success to them more than anyone else. And if you think I am the sort of a fellow who will forget it, you've got me sized up wrong. Now then, I am going to protect my customers, big or little, through thick and thin. I am not going to let any man suffer because he does business with me. No one has ever suffered for it yet, and no one is going to. If you have more confidence in the film trust than you have in me, don't give me your patronage. Let me tell you once for all that the film trust people know that the International Projecting & Producing Company and the Laemmle Film Service have "got the goods on them" and that there is no possible way of stopping the grand march of progress of the independent movement. You've got to take my word of honor for these facts temporarily and those who do so will come out triumphant and smiling. The independent films are causing a sensation wherever they are shown, and they'll do that same thing for you from the very day you begin to use them. Meanwhile quit paying that $2 per week for a license to live. For every $2 you pay out now you'll kick yourself later on. Write to any of my eight big offices and climb into the independent prosperity wagon.

Was Justice Served?

Showing what might result from circumstantial evidence

How often do we hear of the poor unfortunate victim of circumstantial evidence, who, after spending years of incarceration is found to be innocent of the deed for which he was convicted. Worse still, a life has often been given to expiate a crime committed by another. The theme of this Biograph subject shows how easy justice may err. An ex-convict has determined to start a new life, but by a cruel trick of fate is almost returned to prison through convincing circumstantial evidence, superinduced by his past record. A gentleman drops his well filled wallet, which is picked up later by another party who extracts the money and throws the pocketbook away. This is found by our friend just as the owner returns in search of his loss. Appearances are certainly against him and he would have been sent up had not, by a singular coincidence, the finder been impaneled on the jury, and saves him by returning the money.

Length, 962 Feet

The Peachbasket Hat

This is a very funny Biograph comedy in which this latest feminine fancy figures in an apparent kidnapping case. What is more assuring to our patrons is the fact that our old friends Mr. and Mrs. Edward Everett Jones are the leading characters, and we might well add that Jones, Jr., is by no means a small factor in the fun making.

Length, 666 Feet

GEORGE KLEINE

Licensed by Motion Picture Patents Co.

A Good Hearted Policeman

Drama. Approximate Length, 572 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, JUNE 22, 1909.

"It never rains, but it pours," is illustrated very forcibly in this series of cinematographic views.

Out of work and sickness in the family is not an unusual condition, but the measure of sorrow would certainly appear to be full when in order to have the prescription filled the mother borrows money from a relative and when she is about to pay for the medicine finds herself arrested for passing counterfeit money. An investigation reveals the destitute condition of the family, whereupon the officer is so moved to compassion that he substitutes a perfect coin for the false one and that causes the vindication of the woman.

A pathetic situation, well dramatized and of perfect photographic quality.

The Troublesome Lamppost

Comedy. Approximate Length, 357 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, JUNE 22, 1909.

This is unquestionably the greatest spectacular comedy hit. One scene excels the other in production of action and effect.

A lamp-post on the back of an inebriate citizen is accidentally ignited and produces most remarkable effects in pyrotechnic display. Numerous conflagrations ensue and the fire department is given ample opportunity to display its skill.

The Wrong Medicine

Drama. Approximate Length, 502 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1909.

A chemist prepares a prescription, but when later he finds on the bottles a poison label he becomes gravely concerned as he fears that the patient will be poisoned. He gives chase in every possible manner and reaches his destination, shortly after a dose of the medicine is taken. An antidote is administered and every measure to avert a catastrophe adopted. When later the concoction is analyzed it develops to be water and all are happy to be relieved of the anxiety.

Exciting and well rendered.

Stung By A Bee

Comedy. Approximate Length, 377 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1909.

Spending a week-end holiday in the country, the city chap fails to observe that he is preparing for a nap in close proximity to a bee-hive. He soon discovers the fact to his sorrow. His nose swells and directly acquires enormous proportions, causing a very ludicrous appearance. All possible means to remove the unsightly appendage proving unavailing, a miner is finally induced to try his handiwork. He places a charge and sets off a fuse which results in the removal of the troublesome nose.

Editorial.

Why They Are Not Buying.

"Eastward the course of business takes it way," to paraphrase a familiar reference. The American fashionable exodus to Europe commenced several weeks ago, and now the common people are wending their way thither. The reader will probably rub his eyes and ask, "What has this to do with moving pictures?" Let us tell him. Amongst the people leaving these shores for Europe just now are many men prominently identified with the American moving picture industry. They are going to Europe partly for pleasure and partly for business. They are going to Europe to buy goods, which they cannot get in this country although they are made here. Notwithstanding the fact that there are twelve Independent manufacturers of moving picture films in the United States of America at this moment, the exchange man and others to whom we refer, and they are very important men indeed in the business, are going to scour Europe for suitable films for American moving picture theaters.

Why are these men going to Europe to buy films—foreign films—when American made films can be had here in great numbers? We put the question point blank to some of these European pilgrims, "Why go 3,000 miles to buy goods, go to so much trouble and expense, waste of time, and pay heavy import duties, when you can buy the goods right here on the spot?" The answer came swiftly and to the point: "The pictures are not good enough. The public won't stand for them. We are open to buy, but with few exceptions the Independent films of American manufacture are not up to the standard. Good films are made here, but they are few and far between."

Last week, many weeks before, and indeed long before the Independent movement took shape, we told the then existing manufacturers that the battle amongst themselves and against the threatened importers was one of quality. We say the same to the Independent manufacturers. Their chief obstacle to success is want of quality. It is easier for an exchange to buy good old junk, than indifferent new goods. What does it matter to him? What does the public care? With both, the things are either good or bad, whether they be new or old, and some of the new goods are lower in quality than some of the old goods. That is quite evident to anybody with eyes to see. If any Independent manufacturer complains of lack of business he has only himself to thank.

The Pathe or Biograph standard is not to be reached in a hurry. Anybody who starts in the business of moving picture making, and who is not perfectly equipped for the work, has got all that business to learn, and it is not learned in a few months. The delights of authorship, especially young authorship, are so great that they sometimes obscure the judgment of the individual. One is so pleased at having produced something that one is apt to be blind to one's own shortcomings. This, we fear, is the case of many of the newer entrants into the field of moving picture making.

This article is the sequel or corollary of last week's article, "Fooling the Public." Then we pointed out the cause. Now, we indicate the effect. Your exchange man who can only get pictures of Western subjects against Eastern backgrounds is wise to the game. So he goes elsewhere—that is, abroad—for the foreign article. He would much rather stay at home; we would much rather he did. We want him to stay at home and buy of those engaged in the home industry. We do not want to see American money going into foreign pockets, but so long as lack of necessary intelligence amongst the manufacturers exists, so long will Mr. Renter go abroad and spend his money. We wish all the Independent manufacturers, and, indeed, all manufacturers, were animated by the sentiment which we find in a recent film manufacturer's bulletin. Says he: "We present only Western film stories, made in the real deep West." Mark the words: "The real deep West." Let your pictures be all REAL, Mr. Independent Manufacturer. Then you will have no reason to complain that the exchanges are not buying your films, and the money that goes abroad will go into your pockets and not into the foreigners'.

A National Board of Censorship.

First Article.

The problem of a National Board of Censorship for moving picture productions has been solved by the People's Institute of this city, which has undertaken to provide whatever financial support is necessary. The initial expense of the Board was borne by the Exhibitors' Association of New York, but there was no reason why the expenses of a public body, whose work is in the interests of the public at large and national in scope, should be supported by the exhibitors of this or any other city. In fact, it is for the better that it is now entirely divorced from any affiliation with the trade, although trade influence has in no way affected their deliberations.

The necessity for a National Board of Censorship, whose decisions will be final and accepted in every city of the country, is evident from rumors that censorship is being discussed or undertaken in several cities. In Chicago it is in the hands of the police, and we have more than once been compelled to remark on the absurd rulings of the minions of the law in that city. There is a saying, "The nearer the Church, the farther from God," which, while it may appear irreverent, yet has subtle meaning which is borne out in the verdict of the Chicago police inspectors that "The Lonely Villa" must not be exhibited within the confines of that city. Now this film called for the warmest praise from New York audiences and we hear excellent reports on it from all over the country. It is a bloodless drama in Biograph's best style, and there is nothing in it that could offend the most sensitive or instil evil thoughts in the mind of man, woman or child. On the contrary, it teaches a strong lesson that honesty is the best policy, which may not always be a wholesome doctrine

The representative list of civic bodies which are associated with the People's Institute should remove any doubt as to their efficiency to provide a proper censorship of moving picture programmes. And after all, what is censorship? Properly exercised it is the consensus of public opinion. Police censorship is a farce. Censorship by the manufacturers, or even exhibitors, would be impractical and inoperative. Censorship by any one body of men would be unsatisfactory, but where it is rigidly conducted under the auspices of ten civic bodies, separately engaged in looking out for the moral and educational welfare of the community, its influence cannot but be beneficial and their decisions are of sufficient weight to be national and final.

We have before us the following letter signed by four exchanges in San Francisco. It is possible that the Board of Supervisors of that city have not learned of the very efficient work that is being done. It is none to their discredit that their services have been forestalled, but we trust that when their attention is called to the very able manner in which the censorship is already being conducted that they will see the uselessness of a separate Board of Censorship and confine their good intentions to co-operation with the National Board in so far as offering suggestions, which they welcome from all sources.

Possibly you have already been advised that the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco has recently passed an ordinance providing for the appointing of a Board of Censors whose duty it shall be to pass on all motion pictures. The ordinance provides that this Board, composed of appointees from several departments of the city government, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the Exhibitors' Association, shall have full power to reject any pictures that in its judgment should not be put out. The fact that these pictures are supposed to be passed on by a Board of Censors in New York before they are put on the market cuts no figure with them.

They are just getting matters in shape to begin work. Our object in writing to you at this time is to call this matter to your attention and to say to you that in order that there may be no unnecessary delay in our putting the pictures out on release dates it would be advisable that you send all films to us hereafter so that they will reach us two days before the release days. We do not know just how this ordinance will affect the business, but when the Board gets in working order, and it should prove drastic in its judgment, we shall naturally take this matter up with you again.

MILES BROS.
TURNER & DAHNKEN.
THEATRE FILM SERVICE CO.

Next week we will publish a statement from the Board of Censorship and enlarge more fully on the importance of their rulings being generally accepted.

To the list of regular theaters in New York City which make moving pictures the sole bill of fare in the Summer months, must be added the name of the Majestic, on Columbus Circle. It is also proposed to interpolate the pictures with vaudeville. This makes the fifth regular New York theater which has gone over to the moving picture for the Summer. Probably this example will be followed in other directions. It is the thin end of the wedge. The past dramatic season in New York City has been an extremely disastrous one. The records show that there has been nothing but change upon change. Little money has been made and much has been lost. The moving picture comes at a time when the manager of a house can avoid going dark at a comparatively small expense, and rely upon the support of a very large public, who will pay 5 or 10 cents for a good show of pictures, while they hesitate to disburse five or ten times that sum for a dramatic entertainment, the quality of which has to be taken very much on trust.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

INDUSTRIAL USES OF MOVING PICTURES.

The Southern Pacific Railway Company use moving pictures to advertise their line. They exhibit the pictures of their road in all parts of the country, and as they illustrate the characteristic features of the land through which the great railroad passes, farmers and others are thereby attracted to take up the land near the railroad. So enterprising is the Southern Pacific that in London at this moment they have an exhibition of other pictures with the object of advertising the road in England and presumably of attracting intending settlers to the Far West.

In this chapter, with such a conspicuous example before me, I intend to urge the claims of the moving picture as an advertising medium. I think it will be conceded that it is not made so much of as it might be. Yet American business men have the reputation, and it is a well-deserved reputation, for being the best and most enterprising advertisers in the world. The stranger to this country is lost in admiration at the ingenuity and variety of the newspaper and public advertising that is displayed. Nothing is sacred to the advertiser. The most beautiful bit of country, the most majestic building, the handsomest thoroughfare, succumb to his insidious wiles. At night time the illuminated advertising signs in any large city are very wonderful. New York City, for example. The cleverness and effectiveness of the nocturnal advertisements seen between Fourteenth and Fifty-ninth streets constitute in themselves quite an entertainment. I, for one, am never tired of looking at them. Yet, wonderful to relate, nobody has ever thought of utilizing the moving picture in this manner. I have thought out the suggestion in the hope that somebody will see fit to adopt it.

Quite recently I noticed on Broadway a big business house which invited the public to come in and see moving pictures of its works and machinery shops. The public responded in large numbers. I wonder if it has ever occurred to the great railroad companies who have offices in New York, and who so strenuously advertise their respective roads, that moving pictures of those roads would be far more effective than mere stationary photographs. Steamship lines might also adopt the same idea. We hear much just now about the Alaska-Yukon Exposition. Is it too late for the authors to arrange for moving pictures to be taken of various points and shown in the country? Then there are the great agricultural districts to be advertised in a similar manner; in fact, there is hardly an important branch of industry which, it will be seen, could not be brought to the notice of the public by means of the moving picture. For the picture tells the story in the best possible way. It shows life actually as it is being lived, and that is what we all want to see. Works in progress, such as a skyscraper, or a bridge, or the diminution of the building. For manufacturing in all its branches, the moving picture offers itself as a positively inexpensive means of securing an accurate record of the state of affairs at the moment the photograph is taken. Architects, engineers and others know that it is occasionally of the utmost importance to show directors, capitalists and others, pictures of those works actually in progress or at different stages of completion. Stationary photography is mostly relied on. How much more effective and convincing it would be if moving pictures were substituted.

This leads me to a further suggestion. It is this: That within my knowledge no film manufacturing house lays itself out specially to do moving pictures for commercial and industrial purposes. Somebody with the necessary enterprise may see the suggestion and may take up the work. There is certainly a very great demand for it. Moreover, large corporations having control of plants, works in progress, manufactures should certainly find it profitable and helpful to them to have a moving picture plant operating in their equipment, so that at any moment they may secure a record of manufacturing or structural progress. The ordinary stationary photographic outfit is used in this manner very frequently; now surely it is the time and opportunity for the moving picture.

I am surprised that some of the great newspapers do not instal permanent moving picture shows as part of their nightly system of advertising. They are enterprising enough to give you the news in headlines, after the paper has gone to press, or while it is actually passing through the machines. I wonder if it has ever occurred to them to use moving pictures for recording some of the events of the day. There seems to me to be no obstacle in the way. Of course, these uses of the moving picture are less picturesque than that of making stage plays or Wild West shows in the romantic glades of New Jersey, but in a sense they are of not less importance. Ever since moving pictures became popular, the industrial uses of this branch of photography have been unconsciously kept in the background, and yet it will be seen they are very great. For, generally speaking, it may be said that wherever the stationary camera finds a use, there, also, the moving picture camera could find a use. Indeed, there are branches of work in which the latter quite transcends the former in utility. In other words, it will come to this, that wherever it is sought to photograph motion, a moving picture camera will be indispensable. If the trend of affairs in this latter direction could be quite realized, then I am sure the moving picture camera in its industrial applications will have a very useful future before it.

Non-Inflammable Film will be in General Use in a Few Months.

Chemists of the Eastman Kodak Company have been working for many months on the perfection of a non-inflammable celluloid, and if we may judge from the sample before us the success of their efforts to produce the long-wished-for article has been realized. For the past month or more the licensed film manufacturers have been experimenting with the photographic qualities and durability of the new product and it has proven highly satisfactory. Films of the non-inflammable stock have been issued to the exhibitors without their knowing it was such, and there is no apparent difference, except that the non-flam stock seems to be more pliable. There is one thing that the exchanges and exhibitors should note, however, and that is that a special cement is required for jointing the new film. This can be obtained from the Eastman Kodak Company or any of the licensed manufacturers. This cement will also serve for the old stock, but it, and it alone, will make joints in the new film; therefore the exchanges should at once provide themselves with a supply. It will be several months before the Eastman Kodak Company will be able to supply enough of the new material to meet the demand, but we may expect to see it in general use before the close of this year. The importance to the moving picture industry of this progressive step on the part of the Eastman Kodak Company must be evident to all concerned.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER VIII.

RHEOSTATS (Continued).

As regards the rheostats put out with the Lubin machine, cuts are in process of making, but not yet available. There is a rheostat put out by the Chicago Stage Lighting Company and another of the same type put out by the Kleine Optical Company which are in such general use that they must be mentioned, though not put out with a machine outfit. These machines comply with Underwriters' rules and consist of a number of cells in one case. They are well made and in every way first class machines. Each cell is in effect a separate rheostat and the various cells may be used singly, in series or in multiple. The five-cell rheostat is an excellent machine for road work.

TRANSFORMERS.

The use of the rheostat form of resistance on alternating current is out of date. Too much power is wasted in heat, besides which they do not furnish nearly so satisfactory projection current as does a rightly constructed transformer. The "Indicators," "Economizers," "compensarcs," etc., so widely advertised, are nothing more or less than low voltage transformers. The claims made as to current saving through their use are probably somewhat exaggerated, but that they are very much more economical than is the rheostat is beyond question. There is, however, a very decided difference in different makes of these machines and you will do well to investigate carefully before purchasing, especially as they are somewhat expensive in first cost. Their weight renders them undesirable for road work. In ordering it is well to state the number of cycles of the current it is to be used on. A good transformer used on the current cycle it is designed for is absolutely noiseless and you should be able to lay your hand on it anywhere, at any time, without feeling undue heat. Usually they are adjustable, giving about three different amperages, ranging from 30 to 50, from 35 to 55 or 40 to 60 in different machines. It is quite possible to get practically as good projection light from 60 cycle alternating current, by the use of one of these machines, as from direct current, but very close attention must be paid to setting the carbons, as will be explained further on under different heading.

The current you get from a transformer has no kind of mechanical contact with the street mains. It is not the same current as that with which they are charged, but an induced current of much lower voltage. The transformer operates as follows: Within a soft iron core (shell type, Fig. 26), made up of laminated plates of soft iron, are four coils of insulated wire, two of which are called the "primary" and two the "secondary" coils. The two latter (I am speaking now of the projection transformer, though all transformers operate in essentially the same manner) are connected directly with the projection lamp. The relative number of turns and size of wire in the primary and secondary coils will determine the pressure and amount of current you will get from a given line voltage. The secondary coils will have a less number of turns of larger wire than will the primary. Were this condition reversed the machine would then be a "step-up" transformer, furnishing current of higher voltage than that of the line. Should you connect your line wires to the wrong set of binding posts this is precisely the condition you would establish and fireworks would be due real soon. When current is switched on the primary coils the iron plates become magnetized and a current is induced in the secondary coils to which your lamp is attached. Those who wish to learn all about induced currents should consult standard electrical works at their public library.

In Fig. 26 P, P' are the primary and S, S' the secondary coils. Wires a, c would connect to the binding posts marked "Lamp." Shell type transformers are the kind used almost exclusively in projection work. Transformers cannot be used on direct current under any conditions. In making connections you will find, on most machines, two binding posts marked "Lamp." Connect a wire to each post and run one (either one) to one lamp binding post and the other to the other lamp binding post. Some machines have but two other binding posts, they being marked "Line." Run wires from operating room switch to these posts. That is all there is to it. Other machines have four line binding posts, connections being made to different posts for different voltages. Instructions will come with these machines for connecting.

A well built transformer, used on the current it is designed for, will last indefinitely. If at any time there is smoke or odor of burning insulation coming from the machine it indicates that one of the coils is burning, due to overloading or faulty insulation. The machine must be cut out at once and the coil removed and rewound—which is a job for the manufacturer. Do not attempt to run the machine after it begins to burn else you may injure the other coils, thus very greatly increasing the damage. Transformers should be set on insulation the same as directed for rheostats. Cuts of the various machines may be seen in the advertising columns of trade papers. They are a comparatively new thing and manufacturers are changing their machines so often that it is not advisable to run cuts of them in this matter, which will afterward be made into permanent form. The Nicholas Power Company, New York City; J. H. Hallberg; Kleine Optical Company, Chicago; General Electric Company; Electric Appliance Company,—any one or all of them will send you full information about their machines, all of which are standard, well made and efficient.

MERCURY ARC RECTIFIER.

This is a new device put out by the General Electric Company. It is too new to the trade to be well known as yet, but the company claims big things for it. This machine transforms alternating current into direct. The machine operates somewhat as follows: In the first place it is not attached directly to the street mains, but behind a transformer, working on the secondary circuit. There is a large glass bulb with two wings sticking out on either side, near the bottom, to each of which the alternating wires are attached.

At the bottom is a short tube in which is a small quantity of mercury. Near it, also pointing downward, is another short tube containing mercury. By tipping the tube, or bulb, slightly an electric arc is sprung between these two bodies of mercury and this arc creates a mercury vapor which fills the whole bulb, acting as a sort of conductor for the main current which enters through the two side wings, passing down and out of the bottom mercury tube, to which is attached the negative lamp wire. As has been stated, alternating current flows first in one direction and then in the other, changing direction 120 times per second in a 60 cycle current. When the current direction is toward the left hand wing (called an anoid) it enters and passes to the lamp as indicated above, but, when the direction of the current is reversed it cannot flow up and out by reason of the excessive resistance. The opposite wing (anoid), however, is connected to the other wire of the circuit and when the direction changes the current in that wire is then flowing toward that wing and passes through to the lamp just as it did on the other side, but it will be noted that this brings the direction of current flow through the mercury tube always in one direction. This is the principle the machine works on. There are other very important details concerning reactance which maintains the arc during the instant of time in which the direction of current movement is reversed, but this matter would be too deep for the average operator and is of little importance from the operator's point of view, anyhow. The machine seems to be entirely practical and the company claims it reduces current bills very greatly. They are very simple to operate.

THE OPERATING ROOM.

Before taking up lamps, carbons, lenses, machines, etc., etc., we will consider the operating room itself. In nine cases out of every ten, particularly in theaters of the "store room" variety, the operating room of the past has been miserably planned and constructed, the prevailing idea seeming to have been that any space which could not possibly be used for anything else on earth, and that was in sight of the curtain, would do for the operating room. As to size, some managers seem to have considered anything above 4 feet square by 4 deep as a sinful waste of space. The whole show, or the greater portion of it, at least, comes from the operating room, and to expect an operator to produce the best possible results on the screen when cooped up in a little 2 x 4 iron-lined cracker box is expecting just a little too much. The very least permissible operating room dimensions should be 7 feet square by 6 in the clear from floor to ceiling. The writer well knows it is often difficult to get the latter dimensions, but a room that is too low to allow plenty of head room below floor thickness and 6 feet above is not fit for a theater. A 13-foot ceiling will do it easily. In building the operating room be very sure and get the floor perfectly solid. The least vibration will produce very bad effects on the curtain, especially when the stereo picture is on. The writer has seen an operating room floor so loose that every time the operator would move, when running the stereo, the picture would jump. The walls may be built of 3 or 4-inch hollow tile, set in rich cement mortar, plastered inside and out; or they may be made of wood and fireproofed with sheet iron and asbestos, covering floor and ceiling with the fireproofing also, of course. Where studding walls are to be covered with iron and asbestos they should be first covered with rough lumber. Nailing the iron and asbestos directly to studding is very objectionable from any point of view. Cover walls, floor and ceiling completely with sheet asbestos, which should be at least ¼ inch and preferably ⅜ inch thick.

Cover this with sheet iron or steel, with joints well nailed down. This latter is very important, as otherwise the seams will buckle and open up with the heat of a fire. If the walls, floor and ceiling have been completely covered with asbestos and iron, properly put on, the room will stand a surprisingly heavy fire without material damage. Where depth is limited by reason of lack of head room below 2 inches may be made to answer for floor thickness instead of the usual 5 to 7 inches. Cut good, sound 2 x 12 planks, sized on one side, the length you want your operating room. By length I mean from front to back. Ship-lap them ½ to ¾ inch and lay them side by side with plenty of dowel pins between. The back end may rest on a 2 x 6 lag screwed to inside of front wall. At other end, on top and flush with ends of planks lay a good, sound 2 x 4, to which fasten each plank with two ¼ x 4½-inch bolts. This completes the floor, which may be supported from below or hung from the ceiling joists with one ½ inch rod every 3 feet. The floor will be solid if you have used plenty of dowel pins and set them in tight, and will be just 2 inches thick. It may be covered with sheet metal below and painted or covered with canvas and papered. If the planks are more than 8 feet long there should be some rod hangers in center of floor. Use dry, seasoned lumber or cracks will open. In the smaller cities it is not usually required by law that operating rooms be made fireproof. Better do it anyhow, however. It may save your whole house from destruction. By thoroughly fireproofing the operating room as above it is quite possible to burn a whole reel of film, or even two of them, and the audience hardly know of the disaster. To accomplish this, however, you must protect the lens and peep holes, which may be done with small, individual shutters for each hole, arranged to slide up and down in grooves, or hung from a hinge. The latter method is not so good, however, as the shutters will not close tightly. All must be held up by one cord which must be so arranged that the operator can reach it and instantly close all shutters. The cord should be carried directly over the machine head so that the fire will reach and sever it quickly should the operator lose his head. Another and better way is to hang a wide sheet of iron in grooves on the front of the operating room wall. This sheet should be wide enough to cover all holes and be stiffened so that it will remain perfectly flat. Hang with cord running into room, so arranged that operator can drop it instantly, or fire will sever the cord quickly. In addition to this there must be a large vent pipe from the ceiling of the operating room to the open air. This pipe should be not less than 1 and preferably 2 feet in diameter. With such an operating room the films may burn and the audience scarcely know it. Where a large vent pipe is impractical an ordinary stovepipe, with firmly riveted joints, run from near the operating room ceiling to a chimney flue will help a lot, though of course it will not carry off near all the smoke from a burning film. It helps amazingly in ventilating the room, too, in Summer. In the front wall should be a window arranged to open for ventilation. It may be covered on the outside with ornamental lattice if the bare window detracts from the appearance of the front. The door to the operating room should open outward, being held shut with a stiff spring. If a trap door is used it should be not less than 30 inches square.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Somebody is responsible for an unwarranted scare among the moving picture exhibitors of Greater New York as to the future of their business and the matter should be painted in its proper color to disabuse the minds of the misled exhibitors and relieve some well-meaning people of rather unpleasant charges.

On several occasions recently these people have given moving picture entertainments to select gatherings of people engaged, or, to a more or less extent, interested in the various educational institutions. They have been given gratis, the sole object being to get interested in the pictures many people who in the past have failed to become interested in them. Up to a very recent date these people have been opposed to the pictures on account of prejudice created in various quarters by attacks from standpoints of immorality and impropriety. These entertainments have been neither promoted nor conducted by people directly interested in the picture field, but by representatives of the institutions which have assumed the responsibility for raising the standard of the pictures and the places in which they are exhibited. They are the people who constitute the Board of Censors and those that created them.

This campaign of conversion has been going on quietly for many weeks. It has been a gratifying success. Many who looked upon the pictures as an agency through which the younger and weaker minds were being trained in a channel of degeneracy and crime have, by the campaign referred to, been made firm supporters of animated photography. Six months ago the clergy were almost unanimous in their condemnation of the pictures. The attacks were so bitter and sweeping that replies charging those making them with improper motives were freely hurled back. The present situation justifies the statement that many of the attacks that came from the pulpits and like sources were made under misapprehension and without investigation of declarations that had been made by thoughtless writers.

In conducting the campaign the promoters have confined their programmes to educational, historical and biblical subjects. They have proved revelations to the audiences. Those who have heretofore believed, in the absence of personal observation, that the makers of the pictures took their topics from the poor grade of conception and literature that made poorer comedy and deplorable dramatic subjects now concede that the field of animated photography embraces many features of a much higher standard and from an educational standpoint has a scope to which there is almost no limit.

The persistency with which the promoters have worked to enlighten their deluded educators has resulted in suggestions on the part of the latter that such exhibitions as they have witnessed should be given in all the public and parochial schools. In several instances the enthusiasm has prompted much more forcible suggestions, one of which is that every school should have a library comprising subjects of travel in various parts of the world, historical pictures and views bearing upon the various indoor and outdoor industries. Several influential people are now engaged in compiling a list of such subjects now in existence and will be on the alert for any that may be made, the idea being to incorporate the exhibition of such subjects in each day's course of study in the various schools. Discussions bearing upon these suggestions have gradually gained outside circulation, which accounts for the following communication, received this week:

"I understand the city officials are going to give free motion picture exhibitions in all the schools. How many more things are they going to do to us?. They have driven almost to desperation by their regulations for exits, sanitary measures, licenses and Sunday closings, and now they want to drive us out of business altogether. Let them stay out of the show business and give the thousands of men with all their small capital invested in a legitimately conducted business a chance to earn an honest living."

Not wishing to depend entirely upon my own version of what the people advocating the school exhibitions aspired to, I sought an interview with a gentleman eminently qalified to talk on the subject. He said: "Your correspondent has not been correctly informed. In the first place, our movement is not directed against moving picture exhibitors as such. I will admit that a few months ago our people were condemning them quite generally, but we, too, have become educated, as it were, and we now direct our campaign of restriction and condemnation against only such pictures and such picture places as do not conform to morality and propriety. I will go forward a step and say that in this work we try to be as conservative as each case will allow. I am pleased to say that immorality has not manifested itself to anywhere near the extent we were led to believe it existed in the moving pictures. I will also add that impropriety has been almost entirely eliminated from them and the makers of the subjects are exercising commendable zeal in this direction.

"I mention these matters to emphasize the fact that the critics, censors, manufacturers and exhibitors of the pictures are now working in more harmony than during any preceding period and there is no desire on our part to do any injustice to anyone. Your correspondent is misinformed as to the intention of the city authorities. I assume that if the authorities undertook to have the exhibitions given in the public schools the matter would come under the jurisdiction and supervision of the Board of Education, and I am in a position to state authoritively that the Board has not yet had the proposition under consideration. I believe and hope, however, that the day is not too far distant when it will, and I am confident that the proposition will receive cordial support and be adopted unanimously.

"Now let me say that if we succeed in getting the suggestions adopted the regular exhibitors will not suffer.. The school exhibitions will not partake of an entertaining character. For a time they will be a novelty, no doubt, but they will soon settle down to the sphere outlined for them—a process of education. The pupils will become absorbed in the pictures as objects of study and for entertainment they will go elsewhere. Our idea is to eliminate all features bearing upon the comic and dramatic, leaving the pupil to seek such things at the regular places of entertainment.

"The suggestions thus far made are that each school be supplied with a complete set of the subjects we have in mind. The same subjects will be used over and over again, as often as they will last. They will be treated as books, maps, etc., their use being the supplying with more effectiveness points that the books and maps do not quite adequately convey to the mind. You may teach a child the spelling of the name of some bird or animal and spend much time in describing the appearance of some strange people, or country, but the true effectiveness of the teaching is never reached until the original or a picture has been shown. The more fortunate students who can travel to foreign lands may not appreciate our work in this line as those who have neither the means nor hope for such journeys. It is to bring these in closer touch with what they have been studying, and send them out into the world with a more clear conception of what it contains than is conveyed by the cold prints of the books and maps, that we desire to introduce the motion pictures into the schools." OLIVER.

LICENSED MANUFACTURERS DETERMINED THAT THE PUBLIC SHALL NOT BE DECEIVED.

The film manufacturers licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company are determined to protect their rights and trade marks, and exhibitors will do well to be honest in their advertising.

The Biograph Company, one of the foremost film manufacturers in the world, has begun action against Herbert L. Clark, of the Gorman Theater, of South Framingham, Mass., for $25,000 damages for unlawfully advertising Biograph features.

It seems that Clark has been conducting the above mentioned theater and recently advertised Biograph pictures. People are daily recognizing more and more the merit and quality of Biograph films, and naturally flocked to this Gorman Theater believing that they were going to see some of these excellent subjects.

But the pictures shown were not made by the Biograph Company; in fact, they were not made by any manufacturer who is licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company.

Clark, an exhibitor, who is not licensed by the Patents Company, was using the word Biograph in his advertising to attract the people to his house.

The word Biograph is a trade mark belonging to the company of that name, and, of course, is an asset of untold value to them, and when an exhibitor advertises that he is going to show Biograph pictures and then fails to do so, it is what is known in the legal phrase as "Unfair Competition in Trade."

The Biograph Company commenced action for $25,000 damages, filing a bill against him and got service of same on Clark last Friday, June 11.

A trade mark that has become universally recognized as a sign of quality is valuable, and when it is used unlawfully as a false pretense to secure business, it is a serious matter.

ON THE SCREEN.

By "Lux Graphicus."

Arthur McMackin, I salute you. You and I are of one mind. With one slight exception: that I thought and wrote ten years ago what you are writing and thinking to-day. I perceive that you predicate the time when the Film d'Art Theater will take its place between the two institutions of the art gallery and the drama. In that time, you say, we will have the story written by some G. Bernard Shaw, Tolstoi or Ibsen, in which some latter-day Bernhardt, Irving or Mansfield will take the principal role. If you will turn to the pages of the Moving Picture World for March 13 and 20, last, you will find exactly the same sentiments expressed.

That this is no dream and that we are perceptibly advancing towards the much desired goal, is evidenced by some recently published facts. For example: in their Oliver Twist play, the Vitagraph Company had the services of a noted actress, Elita Proctor Otis. More recently there was talk of Miss Adams taking part in moving pictures, and now comes the announcement that the Edison Company are paying a noted star to act before the moving picture camera. Our charming friend, the Biograph heroine, is also said to be a stage celebrity, and the Pathe's enterprise in this respect is well known.

All these are just so many straws showing the direction in which the wind is blowing. There is no dearth of dramatic talent available for the moving picture stage. All that is wanted is recognition on the part of the film manufacturers that this is the kind of goods the public want. Then, no doubt, with true American enterprise, they will deliver said goods to the public. I, myself, know many capable actors and actresses who earn good money in New York City in front of the moving picture camera. As good money as they do on the regular stage. As time goes on there will be more, for Pathe, Biograph and other firms I can see are directing the public to a very high standard, indeed, in acting; below which standard in the near future it will be dangerous for any manufacturer to fall.

I wish I was assured, however, that the Shaws and Ibsens will be called upon to write the stories. There seems at present no disposition to encourage talent of this calibre. When the least sign of that disposition is available, I, for one, will give it every encouragement. It will have to come to it, for the present habit of buying amateur stories at $10, $15 or $20 each and then working them up at the film factory is bound to lead to disaster, as the pages of the Moving Picture World demonstrate every week. If you get first-rate actors and actresses, you must give them first-rate matter to interpret; otherwise, they cannot do justice to themselves. This is logic. It is also the Pathe habit, as shown in "La Tosca."

The McMackin interview on the future of the film which I quoted also contained much other hopeful matter that I was glad to read. G. K. Spoor is the author, and G. K. Spoor says things which incline me to think that the Essanay people have a clear outlook as to the future of the moving picture. Says Spoor: "I thoroughly believe that what the other camera has done and will do, can be duplicated by the moving picture camera." Well, "the other camera," that is, the stationary camera, produces pictorial photographs, which in New York City, London, Paris and elsewhere are publicly exhibited side by side, with the works of the greatest painters of the time. Pictorial photography, in fact, has been admitted to an equality with the older graphic arts. This satisfactory state of things has not come about, but as the result of years of hard work and years of struggle.

Spoor, like a wise man, is no doubt prepared to incur the struggle and do the work. If this sentiment animates all makers of moving pictures, then we are in for a very successful time indeed in this class of photography. The Wild West photograph made in New Jersey will soon be a thing of the past. We shall go to nature for our inspiration. If you want to make a Wild West photograph go to the Wild West. If you want to make a naturalistic, that is, a pictorial, moving picture play, the recognized canons of art can be consulted in any text-book. If you work in accordance with those principles, then you will get a pictorial moving picture. You won't get it by trial and error or by mixing a lot of people's brains together and relying upon the result to be "pictorial." Just in the same manner as so many people rely upon a variety of brains for their moving picture stories. God help those stories, I say.

Pictorial moving pictures can only be made strictly according to rule and formula. Just the same as the other parts of the work—exposure, development, printing, etc. Spoor is, I think, the earliest American film manufacturer to publicly recognize the possibilities of the moving picture, and I hope his words will carry the weight they deserve to.

THE WAGES OF GIRLS WHO COLOR SLIDES.

There have been many complaints lately concerning the quality of lantern slides turned out by certain establishments in this city. The people, of course, who make the complaint do not realize that the remedy lies in their own hands by refusing their patronage to the concerns who turn out the poorly colored slides. They want slides for less than it costs to make good slides and they will persist in buying slides where they can get them cheap, while what they want is $10.00 slides for $3.00 per set.

But the complaint does not all lie against the cheap establishments altogether. We know some of the big slide establishments where the salaries of the girls are based entirely on their speed, but not on their quality, and where they are compelled to keep up a speed of coloring forty slides per day for $7.00 a week and sixty slides a day for $9.00 a week. That, if a person will take a pencil and figure, means what: Why, that the girls get just 2 cents and 6 mills per slide, one-tenth of a cent more than two and a half cents per slide. Perchance some of the girls do more than sixty slides per day; they do not get any more; and some do enough to pull down the price to 2 cents per slide. This fact has been established by actual investigation and inquiry.

Now, what is the result? The result is that all artistic effort is stamped out. The girls do not try to do good work, but only try to see how many slides they can get on the rack when the day's work is done. Another result is that skillful colorists quit the business, leaving only incompetents to teach the newcomers.

I have before me now two slides made by one of the largest slide establishments of this city. One of them was made ten years ago. It represents a landscape and is a work of art. I have another slide of a beautiful landscape made by this same firm recently. It is a miserable daub. The first slide was made when song slides brought $10.00 per set and the latter one came out of a $4.50 set.

It is a sad commentary upon the art of slide making that lantern slides containing eighteen slides to the set have to be sold to-day for $4.50 per set, new. There isn't an establishment in America to-day making slides that gets more than $5.00 per set. What sane man expects to make strictly first-class lantern slides, artistically colored, for 25 cents each and turn out just as good work as he did when he got 75 cents for them?

They also know that they are running sweatshops, where they are taking their lost profits out of the girls who color slides, to recoup them in a measure for the difference in prices which has prevailed since the slide-making business has been entered by concerns knowing but little or nothing about the art. They likewise know that quality has been sacrificed and that there are very few competent colorists left to-day and that the class of women employed are that of poor copyists, instead of colorists. In other words, they are poor imitators of original work and that the work which they do would have been rejected as unfit to be sent out ten years ago.

Apropos of that remark, I wish to state that women apply to me nearly every day for work coloring slides, bringing in very beautiful samples, saying that they have been working for such-and-such a firm, but when you entrust them with work you find that the samples they exhibit are not their work and the work which they are capable of doing is absolutely worthless after it is done. Of course, it is plain that the prices which slide makers can afford to pay to-day for coloring, as before stated, absolutely precludes any possibility of good work. Were I a working colorist I would not do good work for the prices paid.

Now, who is to blame for degrading this noblest of illustrative arts? Simply nobody but the sheet music publishers. My opinion and practice has always been to not do business with any publisher who holds up the argument that because he has to give away slides to singers I should cut my price to him for making slides. What have I to do with the amount he pays out for advertising? Must I help him pay his advertising bills by giving him the profits on the goods I manufacture? I think not, but that is just what a lot of lantern slide makers have been doing. They have been allowing a lot of music publishers to browbeat them into prices so low that they could not get sufficient money out of their business to make competition anything but destructive. Then they have tried to square themselves by robbing the girls who color slides.

Every slide maker in the United States knows that material is higher to-day than it was ten years ago, and that slides cannot be made as cheap to-day as then except by the constant pressing down of wages. Yet the slide making establishments are increasing by the dozens. Ninety per cent. of them could go out of business to the absolute betterment of the art, to say nothing about the betterment of the industry, and perhaps I may be among the number. Fully ninety per cent. of them are incapable of turning out a decent slide and the country is overloaded with their trash. I do not consider myself a manufacturer, as I do but very little new work outside of my own publications, but I know whose slides sell from my shelves, and I know the concerns also whose slides are dead stock. The music publisher is wholly responsible for the trash with which the country is littered and encumbered to-day, and he is also responsible for the degradation of the art and the cutting of prices to the bone, because no man will make as good a slide for 25 cents as he will for 50 cents, and no man will make as good a slide for 50 cents as he will for 75 cents. And even so few slide makers cannot make a good slide at any price, yet the good shops have placed themselves on a level with these upstarts by listening to the music publishers howl for lower prices.

The latest thing is that a certain slide maker in this city is now offering the music publishers to illustrate any song they want pictured and offers to buy 1,000 sheets of the music, if they will give him the exclusive privilege of picturing their songs. He agrees to give ten sets of finished slides in half payment for the eighty dollars the music will cost, and the rest in cash and agree to put twenty-five sets of slides out where they will go through sixty theaters inside of six weeks.

(Some of the publishers sell their music as low as sixty dollars per thousand, and while at eighty dollars this man is selling his ten sets of slides $4.00 per set, when he strikes a publisher who sells his music at sixty dollars per thousand he is only getting three dollars per set for his slides.)

Now this man should know the law as well as anybody and he should know that any music publishing house cannot give him or any other slide maker the exclusive right to illustrate his songs and that the minute that publisher advertises the name of any slide maker as having illustrated his song without authority from the publisher's firm he subjects the publishing house to a suit for damages because it does not require any authority from them for any man to make pictures for a song.

Now this slide maker, as the bargain is understood, makes and circulates 35 sets of song slides for which he does not receive one cent except the half of the 1,000 sheets of music. He will of course reduce his colorists' pay again to help out in this ridiculous scheme to destroy what little profit there is left in the slide business. H. B. INGRAM.

BACKGROUNDS FOR SONG SLIDES.

Mr. J. F. Bull, a noted English background painter, gives, in The Kinematograph, the following hints on the preparation of backgrounds for song slides: "As a practical artist for studio work, I think many slide makers are mistaken in posing their life models in front of ordinary scenery executed in various colors. Your own experience will doubtless tell you that a really satisfactory result cannot be obtained by these means. No matter what background is wanted, whether a sylvan glade, a seascape, a rich interior, a street scene, or a crofter's kitchen, to get a good result let it be painted in neutral tints on a flat background, thoroughly stretched, and not submitted to the gaze of the camera until it is absolutely dry. Take care not to dress your models in unsuitable colors, the first frocks of the period which come to hand at a theatrical costumiers may be quite unsuitable for photographic work—let the tints be sober, but be very careful to secure graceful drapings and natural pose; then take your pictures, develop slowly and carefully and when properly fixed, have your slides colored by hand, allowing an artist of genius to finish them to his own satisfaction when given absolute carte blanche! This simple method will be found to give the best results even in these days of iso-chromiate discovery. I fear one or two of your previous correspondents have overdone the cost. I cannot see why really excellent original slides to illustrate a new song, for instance, cannot be produced at from £3 to £4 each—I am speaking of the originals, or proof copies! Now few songs need more than eight slides so £30 ought to provide a full set and if at this figure a slide dealer cannot make a good thing of song slides the present state of the market is very discouraging. As to screens, most of these are now required opaque; so long as they remain as originally fixed this is easy, but when the company running the show goes on tour that screen needs transportation, and whether it rolls up or folds up or do what you may with it, when erected it is bound to show sings of wear. It has been suggested to me that a screen composed of sections, somewhat like a firework set piece, each being of a size suitable for depositing in a guard's van on the railway, would meet the difficulty. To get a 24-foot picture this would entail 24 sections, each 6 feet by 4 feet. The intersection could possibly be prevented from showing during use, but I fear the thing would prove unwieldly in transit. You see, if each frame was only 2 inches thick the entire screen when packed would measure 4 feet by 4 feet by 6 feet. The bamboo frame and sheet device generally in vogue is scarcely satisfactory; it is often easy enough to fix them up on the floor, but when it comes to rendering them vertical that is another matter. To get a really unsagged screen over 20 feet is still a matter of considerable difficulty for the showman. I am giving my attention to this requirement and hope before next Autumn to publish the result of my experiments. A baggy screen spoils any picture, so this is a vital desideratum."

SONG SLIDE NOTES.

We hear that the young lady pianist at the moving picture theater at or in the neighborhood of 116th street who pronounced Miss Henrietta Markstein's compositions "Punk," has lost her job. The story is "that her employer gave her Offenbach's "Cascade of Roses," and Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words" to play as a prelude, and she fell off her chair and had a fit. In justification to her we wish to say that it is also reported that her employer was induced by a joker who flim-flammed him to go to Schirmer's and ask for some first-class classical ragtime productions and a German clerk recently imported by the house of Schirmer from Swabia gave him the above-mentioned pieces. Hence the catastrophe.

The person who engages in the manufacture of any article and cuts the prices of established firms in the same line of goods at once admits that he is turning out an inferior article.

There is no reason why any man who makes just as good an article as any competitor cannot get just as good a price. If he cannot get the standard price he does not make just as good an article. There is no philosophy in bidding for patronage by trying to undercut prices. The song slides made for "I Wish I had a Girl," for $3.50 per set were of the "just as good" kind, but when Jerome H. Remick got the slides made at $5.00 per set by DeWitt C. Wheeler for the same song he discarded the other. It's always safe to trust the bridge that carries you safely over.

The man who publishes a boastful, dishonest, misleading advertisement lives next door to the thief, and is an accessory to the crime of theft both before and after the fact.

It is not necessary for a man to do business any longer in Chicago or New York to prosper. Many of the most prosperous moving picture exchanges are in the second and third class cities. It is only necessary to show the moving picture shows in the neighborhood of these cities where they gain in express charges and other incidental expenses by patronizing home concerns when they leave the exchanges operating in the big cities.

The Chicago Song Slide Exchange is reporting a steadily increasing business. The illustrated song has become indispensable with the well-conducted theater, and a good singer and beautiful slides are to some the chief attraction on the program. Exhibitors all through the country are beginning to realize the importance of this and are booking their songs just like their film service, through firms that make a specialty of this line. Film exchanges used to carry slides as a side line, but it seems the film people didn't give the attention to this entertainment that it deserves. This fact was early recognized by Messrs. Honeck, the originators of the song slide exchange in the West, and these gentlemen opened an establishment for renting of song slides for a small rental fee a week. The idea met with tremendous success from the very start and hundreds of theaters all through the country are now getting their weekly supply of song slides from this firm. The success of the Chicago Song Slide Exchange, of course, is largely due to the grit and ample management of the two brothers that run the Chicago office, Messrs. C. E. and C. R. Honeck. Mr. R. C. Honeck, their father, president of the concern, has been compelled to abandon their St. Louis office to be able to handle the increase of trade in the last few weeks accumulated in the Chicago office.

FOOL AND FREAK LEGISLATION.

By F. H. Richardson.

The writer is aware that the above title is strong, but firmly believes the acts of certain legislative bodies, both State and city, fully justifies even more severe names. New York's law-makers, filled to the brim with the wisdom of the ages, have solemnly decreed that no child of less than sixteen may be admitted to a motion picture show, presumably when unaccompanied by a parent —for even the Solomons which compose New York's legislative bodies would not feel severely shocked if a parent took his or her child to a moving picture show, though, as a matter of added safety, they might require that both the maternal and paternal ancestors be along, with maybe a grandparent thrown in for added safeguard. But these wise legislators kindly allow children of even ten years to roam the streets of the cities at any hour of the night. Selling papers and in pursuance of their "business," or with no business at all, these babies may and do visit the most disreputable sections of New York at all hours of the night —particularly Saturday night, when the Sunday papers are on sale. The writer has with his own eyes seen boys—yes, and girls, too—with a bundle of paper, on the streets at 2 A. M. That these children, and their number is great, learn more devilment in one night on the streets than they would learn in a year, or in ten of them, in nickel shows, no sane man will deny. But the legislative owl faces don't throw any fits over the demoralizing of these children, do they? Then, too, these same wise, WISE law-makers allow the children to work in factory and store below the age of sixteen, don't they? They allow them to go to the "family" theater, where melodrama with all its lurid, sensational, Deadshot Dick, murder, robbery, arson plays are set forth with every possible grewsome detail.

But the nickel theater—horrors! and then more horrors! They must not go there, for they might be led astray and contaminated!

Piffle and O fudge! Is it really the children or the theatrical trust they are so solicitous about? Don't all answer at once! I wonder which it is. I'm not making any assertions, mind you, but I have the inalienable right to wonder all I please. There isn't a man on this earth who is more willing and anxious to protect the children than is the writer, who, by the way, has four of his own, and he can absolutely prove having spent both time and money, in years gone by, advocating curfew and child labor laws. The legislator who calmly allows children to run the streets at all hours of the night without let or hindrance, who allows nickel and ten-cent novels of the worst, most lurid type to be freely displayed and sold on public newsstands; who allows murders, robberies, kidnappings, arson, burglary and almost every crime in the catalogue to be depicted on the stages of theaters avowedly catering to women and children—I say, allows all this and much more—and then suddenly grows exceedingly virtuous over a nickel show displaying nothing but films censored by a board which all recognize as high class, reminds me very much of the lines:

"We strain with mighty straining
At a measly little gnat,
And swallow a rhinoceros
And not an eyelid bat."

Such legislation is not honest. It is not good sense and is rightly named by the heading of this article. In view of the fact that no other than the moving picture theater is named, the writer believes the law could be overturned on the grounds of class legislation.

But the New York law-making body has no monopoly on "wisdom." The legislature of Pennsylvania (where an Epworth Band of Hope built the capitol) also has been heard from in no uncertain tones and mighty is its roar and great is its wisdom. Were Solomon alive he would turn green at such display of subtle penetration, acumen and almost human intelligence. One provision of a law governing theaters (I believe it is all kinds of theaters in this case) recently passed by that body of astute statesmen is that there shall be two side and one center aisles, each four feet in the clear. Now the writer is operating in a State street (Chicago) theater which cost many thousands of dollars and of which the rent alone would scare a Pennsylvania legislator into fits. This house has the record of having handled 1,400 people in a single hour, and it is just 18 feet 3 inches wide, though very long. Now, according to the accumulated wisdom of the Pennsylvania oracle, this house would be allowed just four seats to each row and it would have twelve feet of aisle space. Six feet three inches of seat to twelve feet of aisle. Haw! haw! Do you imagine property costing many thousands of dollars could be thus confiscated by a fool law like that? Not on your life!—unless our courts have gone mad, too. Had the legislature said there could be but so many seats in a row unbroken by an aisle of certain width, and made the seat number and aisle width reasonable, they would have been passing a good and sensible law.

Notable Film of the Week.

"La Tosca" (Pathe).

"What acting!" said a man sitting in front of us at the conclusion of the Pathe, "La Tosca," which we witnessed last week. Then he repeated, "What acting! Those French people can do it." No more striking piece of criticism could be passed on this film, than that of our friend, whom we quote. He was an intelligent man, and when the other pictures came on, he turned to us with a smile of deprecation, and the remark, "Not anything like so good as that French one." Pathe Freres are evidently getting down to the best line of moving picture making to cultivate: that of the modern drama. The antique and the historical are all very well, but nobody wants them, and few people understand them, especially in America. The Moving Picture World's formula for a simple dramatic story clearly told and well acted is evidently the Pathe formula of to-day. And the result is complete success all along the line. "La Tosca" gave Sarah Bernhardt her greatest chance of tragic success and her followers and would-be imitators on the stage also find in it a fine opportunity for their talent. Moreover, the play was regarded as Victorien Sardou's masterpiece of dramatic construction. Consider for a moment what splendid opportunities for acting this piece affords! Floria Tosca, the Roman singer, is beloved by a young artist, Mario Cavaradossi, during the war time in Rome 109 years ago. The Chief of Police, Baron Scarpia, also loves the woman and determines to possess her. Mario unwisely interferes on behalf of a political agitator, and this is Scarpia's opportunity. He gets La Tosca in his power by torturing Mario in her presence when the agonized woman reveals where the concealed culprit is hiding. Mario is ordered to be shot by Scarpia; to further his ends, he gives orders that blank cartridges only are to be used. Secretly, however, he countermands the order. He also gives La Tosca and Mario a passport. This is his opportunity. He importunes the beautiful singer to yield to his embraces, but seeing that she has secured the freedom of her lover, as well as herself, she stabs her enemy to death and escapes only to find that Mario has been shot in real earnest. All that is then left for her to do is to fling herself from the battlement of the castle, and so the triple tragedy ends.

Now this, it will be seen, is a very simple story which can be followed without the aid of a book, although it is better, of course, that the audience should be already familiar with it. As a film, it unquestionably ranks as a masterpiece, flawless from end to end. Consider the acting: It is by some of the most renowned artists in the world; for if La Bargy, Alexander and Cecile Sorel came to New York, they would draw all the town. They are the most celebrated of the kind on the stage to-day. The piece affords chances for the display of the most tragic emotions, and as you sit and look at the development of the drama, you are totally unconscious of a film moving in front of you. It looks for all the world as if the actual incidents themselves were taking place before you, so convincing, so intense is the action of this great drama. Indeed, there is not a moment when excitement is not at fever heat. No useless pause, no padding, no superfluous movement—everything has been perfectly rehearsed and the result is a stage play certainly unexcelled in our experience of moving picture drama. It goes without saying that the picture is superbly mounted. That is to say, the costumes, the scenery and the appointments are reproduced with Pathe's well-known fidelity to the originals. As we have said before, it is flawless.

And, again, it has been carefully photographed. The film we saw didn't show a single technical defect. The tints and tones of the picture harmonize with the various scenes; in fact, you get a very fine series of stage pictures all through. The actress's salon, the mob in the streets, the prison cell, the castle battlements, nothing could possibly be finer. And then, again, the steadiness of this picture on the screen was simply wonderful; we were absolutely unconscious of the slightest movement. Presumably a very steady camera was used; the film accurately perforated and ideal care exercised in the printing. The result seems to be that on a good projector nearly ideal steadiness is assured. We would say to those who wish to see the high water mark of moving picture drama on the screen, that the Pathe "La Tosca" gives them a chance which should not be missed. It is unquestionably the finest moving picture that we have seen.

"THE JAPANESE INVASION" (Kalem).

It was obvious that sooner or later "An Englishman's House," which at present is running in two London theaters, would suggest the handling of a similar theme from the American standpoint. "An Englishman's House," it may be explained, is a play by a well-known literary officer which deals in comedy form with the every-day facts that are likely to be happening at the moment when the unexpected invasion of Britain by Germans takes place. By a mixture of comedy and tragedy it brings home to the average Britain an imminent danger which is as real as any material fact in of comedy and tragedy it brings home to the average Briton and Germany is not an impossibility. Unfortunately, however, the ordinary mass of ignorant people, which means to say, a preponderance of the population, does not realize this fact, and so Major Du Maurier, in order to bring the danger home to the comprehension of the "average ass," wrote the play of "An Englishman's House." This play was produced in New York City, and it failed because an average New York audience does not understand the situation of matters in Britain.

It is greatly to the credit of the Kalem Company that they have outstripped every competitor, every dramatist, and, we believe, every author in handling the possibility of a Japanese invasion of America, from a standpoint quite as intelligible as that taken up by Major Du Maurier. And the Kalem Company, if we may say so, have gone about the business with an intelligence not inferior to that possessed by the British military officer. They have gone right down to roots, and the story they unfold is an eminently feasible one, which no doubt will appeal to the practical instincts of American people. It shows the feasibility of an invasion, and, what is more, a successful invasion, of the Pacific Coast by the Japanese. True, it leaves the issue in doubt; at the end of matters you don't know whether the Japanese won or Uncle Sam won. Of course, every one hopes and believes that the United States of America could not, or would not, lose.

The story shows how a Japanese spy is disguised as a butler, enters the service of an American general at Santa Barbara, and from him obtains particulars of army dispositions and strategy, which are conveyed to the Japanese forces. With this information the Japanese land on the Pacific coast. They interrupt telegraphic communication and then, in a fine series of incidents, we witness what imagination tells us to be the cannonading of the American forces by the Japanese; a hand-to-hand set-to between the soldiers of both armies, and finally the heroic defense of Old Glory by three of our bravest sons. The picture ends indecisively, and we imagine that on this point there will be much discussion. In Britain the Germans are always beaten off, for tales of this kind are by no means new; they, in fact, to our knowledge are over twenty years old. Here, however, the producers of this magnificent film have exercised their discretion in ending with a note of interrogation—a discretion which we do not feel justified in questioning. So much for the story and the reflections which it excites. What of the photography and the dressing of the piece? Speaking of the latter, it is hard for the ordinary layman to imagine that there could be any other way of accoutring the soldiers, conducting the military movements, the elaborate marchings, the battle and the hand-to-hand conflict. It all looks so real—so real, indeed, that it recalls to us in parts some moving pictures of the Japanese War that were shown in London, and which had been obtained by a moving picture photographer at the risk of his own life, for he penetrated right within the firing line and braved the crossing shells. But, aside of our own impressions of the realism of these pictures, we have the evidence of the Kalem Company that the military costumes and all the details, even down to the enacting of the piece by real Japanese, have been provided by expert help. In other words, the piece has been accurately and conscientiously stage managed. The acting, or rather the action, if we may so term it, seems to us to be above criticism, it was so spirited, so earnest, and just what we might expect in a state of real war. Of course, the public little knows what real war is like. Those actually engaged in it are too busy to concern themselves with what is going on outside of their own sphere, and it is rarely the privilege nowadays of any outsider to get within miles of an actual conflict of a hand-to-hand character.

The photography is uniformly fine throughout. The scene in which the Japanese officers discuss the proposed invasion is very pretty and picturesque—Japanese, of course; at least, we assume so, for we have never been in Japan. And then the particular scene where the Japanese cavalry are seen traversing the peaceful fields is also a very fine piece of accurate photographic translation. Indeed, simply in respect of the photography the Kalem Company have gone up in our estimation enormously, for they show that they have absolute command over the technique of the subject.

Altogether, "The Japanese Invasion" is a piece of work which calls for the very highest praise. The skill, the enterprise, the daring and the brilliancy of the idea show that in the Kalem Company we have a moving picture firm of unbounded ambition. The picture will assuredly be a phenomenal success wherever it is shown. It is really so marvelously good, and the people who have made it have such a thorough grip of the enormous possibilities that yet lie before the moving picture, that our sincere appreciation of this fine piece of work does not prevent us asking the Kalem Company, "When are you going to excel your present best?" This will be a very hard thing to do, but we think the Kalem Company will do it.

ANOTHER FILM D'ART.

"The Grandfather," by M. Edmund Gueroult, which will be issued by Pathe next Wednesday, is a powerful rendering of a dramatic episode in the Franco-Prussian war. Well-known actors from the Comedie Francaise and Theater Rejane, in Paris, portray the leading characters in a most artistic manner.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

An energetic person was energetically thumping the piano in the front entrance of the Comedy Theater, on Fourteenth street, on the hottest afternoon of the present week, so, as I was anxious to escape the torrid heat, the energetic person's musical invitation had the desired effect, and, having parted with my nickel, I was soon in possession of a front seat in this temple of the moving picture drama. I had no sooner sat down when a young lady started to sing a song to some of my excellent friend, Levi's, highly colored song slides. According to the title, it was a love song, though the young lady appeared to have a good voice and to be able to use it, I did not catch what she sang, because there was another energetic person at another piano thumping so energetically on the unoffending instrument that he absolutely drowned the singer's voice. Apparently it was a contest between the two, and the pianist won; which, I think, to say the least of it, was rather unchivalrous. They evidently believe in loud music on Fourteenth street. I don't. I hope the next time that I go there they will have the soft pedal on the instrument.

Curious to tell, the theater was crowded. I suppose with people who, like myself, sought half an hour's cool retreat at the small charge of a nickel. No doubt the Comedy is popular, as people seem to be going in and out all the time. It is one of the few moving picture theaters with a "rake" on it. That is, the floor slopes down from the back of the hall to the orchestra, so that the people in the rear see well over the heads of those in front. It is well provided with exits and it is safe and well conducted.

The pictures shown at the Comedy seem to be three or four weeks old, but that, I suppose, is by arrangement. Considering the severe competition that is on Fourteenth street, it must be considered something of a phenomenon to find any one moving picture theater crowded on a hot June afternoon. It says much for the popularity of this form of entertainment. Possibly there are persons who walk along Fourteenth street with a handful of nickels and dimes, patronizing each show in turn. I have heard that there were such people, although I have never met one.

You see, a "dose" of moving pictures, as was pointed out in these pages a few weeks ago, is an unfailing specific for brain fag. Would you believe it, that when I went to the Comedy the other day I was suffering from severe nervous irritation superinduced by having to endure the lengthy recital of the woes and worries of a fellow man in whom I do not possess the smallest scintilla of interest. "I love my fellow man—but, oh! you bore." Well, when I had taken my seat in the Comedy Theater and the pictures got in motion, the mental absorption so caused quite refreshed me, notwithstanding the athletic performances of the two energetic pianists, so that when I came out I was another man and felt quite benevolent.

I had almost forgotten to mention the one outstanding feature of the Comedy entertainment, for which it certainly deserves a word of praise. I allude to the very excellent lecturer they have there. This gentleman on Tuesday last lectured whilst the Biograph picture, "The Son's Return," was being shown, and he did his work exceedingly well. As good lecturers are scarce, this one is entitled to a word of encouragement. My one regret is that he had such a disagreeable subject to talk about. I think the audience shared my opinion.

Comments on the Week's Films.

"THE LONELY VILLA" (Biograph).

"Thank God, they're saved!" said a woman behind us at the conclusion of the Biograph film bearing the above title. Just like this woman, the entire audience were in a state of intense excitement as this picture was being shown. And no wonder, for it is one of the most adroitly managed bits of bloodless film drama that we have seen. From the moment the picture starts all is expectancy. The occupants of a beautiful house received a message by the hands of a man, who is nothing more nor less than a burglar's decoy. The father of the family is decoyed away by this bogus message, and in his absence the burglars enter the house, to the evident alarm of the lady and her children, who, realizing their danger, barricade themselves in room after room, which are entered by the miscreants. Meanwhile, the automobile of the father has broken down on his journey, and we see him communicating by telephone with his agonized wife, who is telling him to return and deliver her children and her from peril. But the burglars have got wise. They cut the telephone wires. All seems lost. Anothing thrilling scene shows us the husband driving frantically along the road in a gipsy wagon. Yet, apparently his efforts are in vain, for the next scene shows us his poor wife and children beaten back in their defense. At this moment the villains break into the room, commence to strip the lady of her jewels and ransack the place. But deliverance is at hand right in the nick of time. The husband enters with police help. The burglars are arrested and the situation is saved: to the manifest relief of the audience who have followed the picture, as we have said, with the greatest possible interest and excitement. Indeed, when we saw the picture at Fourteenth street, the house literally "rose" at the story, it is so closely, effectively and convincingly told. As good a piece of sharp, rapid, decisive, dramatic work as we have seen. As is usual nowadays with all Biograph stories—and the Biograph Company certainly have the art of getting hold of good stories—this one is finely photographed. The acting, too, is of a high order. The villains are villainous, the husband very realistic in his agony, especially at the telephone, whilst the Biograph heroine is as handsome and graceful as ever. We really felt inclined to kick that burglar man for so unceremoniously stripping the jewels from this fair lady's neck. "Lonely Villa" is another Biograph success.

"THE MOONSTONE" (Selig).

The conversion of Wilkie Collins' famous novel into a moving picture film interested us greatly, for we have read nearly every line that Collins published in novel form. "The Moonstone" is not the least of our favorites. Very weird, very fascinating, very eerie is the book, with its story of the theft of the Indian diamond, "The Moonstone," its adventures in London and its final recovery and restoration. We were curious to see if Mr. Selig had succeeded in producing anything of the wonderful atmosphere of the story. Collins was a master hand at the mysterious in fiction; in some respects he may be regarded as the great exemplar for Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. In other respects he resembles Edgar Allen Poe. When you start one of his books, he hands you out a mystery for hundreds of pages, he keeps your mind always on the alert to know how it all ends, and even his last pages don't tell you. The unravelment is a gradual and scientific process. So you must not skip any part of his books, you must read it all.

Now in this very fine film, gorgeous with oriental drapings and costumes, we seemed, as we watched its progress on the screen, to be breathing the very atmosphere that Collins created. Mystery starts almost at the beginning, when, as the result of a Sepoy outbreak, the great diamond is stolen from the head of the Idol. Thereafter the scene changes to London, and the story is that of the tracking down of the stone by mysterious-looking Indians. It is hidden by a somnambulistic woman; there are many adventures and encounters; it is recovered from a chimney stack on the top of a roof, and, finally, to crown all, it is restored to the head of the Idol, amidst the salaams and obeisances of gorgeously robed Orientals. Very exciting, very mysterious and very fascinating. It is quite the thing to expect lively and accurate Western dramas from the Selig studio, but it is a far cry indeed from the hurly-burly of the great untamed American West to the mysticism of the Orient, yet the drama is quite as successful, and so far as one may judge who is unaccustomed to the manner of living there, the details seem to have been worked out with quite as close fidelity to facts as has been shown in other dramas. Even though the Orient is supposed to be best represented by mystery, there is stir enough in this picture to keep the audience up to the highest pitch. To be sure, the scene changes to London, and one is disposed to think that the details of the London scene are less faithfully rendered. There is no such place as Hampton Heath in London, Mr. Selig. There is a Hampton, small town on the Thames, near London, and there is a Hampton Court, but no Hampton Heath, as you would have us believe in your splendid film, "The Moonstone." We know, because many of the happiest hours of our lives have been passed at that same Hampton. Apart from this, the setting is splendid and the scene showing the conflict in the car of a balloon far up among the clouds is highly sensational.

In this film, as in many others recently made, Selig shows that he has an eye for the gorgeously effective and magnificent in spectacle. He is marking himself out as the spectacular producer par excellence. He dresses his pieces superbly, and they are well photographed and judiciously tinted. Moreover, he is paying greater attention to the acting part—a respect in which some American film makers have hitherto been somewhat deficient. The picture was followed with real interest by a crowded house. It adds another laurel to the many that Selig has recently gainted as a famous manufacturer of moving picture films.

"THE CLOISTER OR THE HEARTH" (Urban-Eclipse).

Last week's Urban-Eclipse release contained a passage which, in our opinion, entitles it to take the very first rank as a pure piece of lofty sentiment conveyed by means of the moving picture. The story is that of a girl, who prefers to enter a nunnery rather than marry the man whom her parents have chosen to be her husband; and so she takes the veil. In after years, however, a favored lover finds her out in the nunnery grounds, and endeavors to induce her to break her vows. But this she refuses to do. We have never seen a more beautiful picture than that in which the nun turns from her lover and walks away from him through the sun-lit cloister, without flinching from her duty. As a stage picture it is unexcelled. The acting of both characters was fine and the photographic rendering of light and shade absolutely perfect. The story might fittingly have ended here, but the author of it has thought fit to attach a climax, so as to bring about something like the conventional happy ending. Years afterwards, the lover, who is a soldier, is wounded on the field of battle, and there he is discovered by the Sister of Mercy to whom he is only temporarly reunited, for both are victims of an exploding shell and die in each other's arms. A very telling story. The part which particularly appealed to us was that which illustrates the conventional calm of the cloister. Urban-Eclipse films have, of late, not come so prominently forward as they might have done. Photographic and dramatic work of this kind, however, cannot but give Mr. Kleine every confidence that he is handling a line of film which deserves to take the most prominent position in the moving picture field to-day.

"THE SON'S RETURN" (Biograph).

The latest release of the Biograph Company would seem to point to the fact that their scene of operations has been shifted from Fourteenth street to the country. Presumably, when this picture was made, the staff had not settled down to its work, for the result can hardly be said to be equal to the very high standard to which the Biograph Company have recently accustomed us. Some of the earlier scenes of the film are, we think, idyllic. The meeting of a girl and her lover amongst the fruit blossoms, for example. The remainder of the film, however, is far below this in merit. The main thread of the story is simple, it is true, but to our minds hardly an agreeable one. A boy leaves home to make his way in the world, and after five years is successful. He returns home in disguise and stays at the very inn kept by his parents, whom, we are asked to believe, fail to recognize him. The parents are about to be turned out of their home because they cannot pay their rent, so in their dilemma the father resolves to rob the sleeping stranger—his own son. But the "sleeping stranger" wakes up whilst the old man is at his pockets, whereupon the old man knocks him senseless with a blow. Then, in company with his wife, they take the body and drop it in a field. But the stranger is not dead, and, wonderful to relate, is found and taken to the home of his sweetheart, who has been waiting for him these five years. Remorse, however, has seized upon the imaginary murderer. He goes to the home of the girl, prepared to avow his crime, whereupon the recovered man is produced and the parents and son recognize each other. The son at first declines to forgive his parents, but finally does so, and all ends happily. If such a series of incidents in real life could be said to end happily! Of course, the story is exceedingly improbable. It is inconceivable that after a lapse of five years a man and a woman in full possession of their faculties could fail to recognize their own son, especially when he was asleep, and even though he wore a beard. On the other hand, if it is conceivable, it is straining the probabilities too far. The whole story is unpleasant, and we regret that the Biograph Company should have had their very high reputation jeopardized by such work. It is obvious that there has been a lapse somewhere. The photography of the piece is not up to the Biograph level, nor is the acting. We have not the smallest doubt that very speedy efforts will be made to efface the indifferent impression created by Monday's release.

"Through Jealousy."—A Lubin which, while it lacks any particular merit in acting, tells an interesting enough story, basing it upon jealousy. Perhaps it might be true that jealousy should develop like this. It seems plausible, at any rate, when watching this picture. While there is an accident, the audience is spared any death scene, and the ending is happy. Photographically some improvement is possible in places, but this is true only in spots. As a rule, the picture is good, and the story it tells is strong enough to hold the undivided attention of the audience.

"A New Trick."—It is worth something to originate a fresh bit of comedy. This the Biograph Company has done, and shows in this picture an entirely new way to make a thief disgorge. The two hurrah boys get the girl's pocketbook and a few other things they didn't expect, and the thief's facial expression when he realizes that he has been duped never fails to raise a laugh.

"Prof. Wise's Brain Serum Injector."—A Lubin comedy which is well carried out. The action is very lively and some interesting effects are produced.

"Ten Nights in a Bar Room."—If temperance advocates want any stronger advocate of total abstinence than this picture from the Essanay studio it would be difficult to find it. Based on the old story of that name, the acting is very realistic. One feels that the audience is indeed fortunate to be spared the scenes of all the nights. Those depicted are sufficient for the purpose. The recovery from the attack of delirium tremens, the recovery of the little girl, the return to work, the promotion and the last scene after seven years of sobriety are all pleasant. The effects of over-indulgence are perhaps more strongly emphasized by being offset by the happiness that comes from sobriety. It is not a pleasant film, yet it is strong and should be popular. But the Essanay photographer will be losing his job if he cannot do better. Patches of white, without the least detail, are not permissible in modern work. The cause is obvious to every photographer who knows his business, and we have seen "dupes" films in which the details and halftones were better rendered than in portions of this Essanay film.

"The Race Course."—A record film from the Eclipse house, representing a series of scenes at a race course at Saurakarta, Java, and has much of educational interest and value. Perhaps the most interesting feature is the oxen race, the first time such a race was ever shown to Americans. The photographic quality is good, and as transcriptions of actual scenes are always interesting, this picture charms by its representation of actual occurrences in that far-away part of the world.

"Snakeskin Industry in Java."—If one wants a choice selection of creeps they are easily acquired by looking at this Pathe film. It is interesting to know how those beautiful skins of which purses and a whole collection of other attractive articles are made, but it certainly does create a feeling of disgust to see the natives catch the huge pythons, carry them in and skin them. Technically the film could scarcely be improved, but one is inclined to deny that the subject is attractive.

"A Woman's Intrigue."—A beautifully colored Pathe picture which illustrates some good acting, though the subject is too abhorrent to allow one to be pleased with it. To have a wife begin making love to her husband's brother almost as soon as she sees him for the first time is not to be commended. Perhaps that her perfidy is discovered and amends made is sufficient compensation. On the other hand, how about the husband whose hopes were thus ruthlessly shattered? The photography and the tinting are exceptionally good and it is a pity the excellent qualities were not utilized in illustrating a pleasanter subject.

"Romance of Old Mexico."—Save for the costuming this might have been a romance anywhere. Nevertheless, the Vitagraph actors and stage managers have achieved a reasonable degree of success in presenting a picture which is full of life and has plenty of action until the play is about half done, then its strength wanes, and the reconciliation scene is anything but convincing. The gatherings and the dances are quite satisfactory, and the disaffection of the lover is not without its interest, but there the interest ends and the remainder is played in a more or less perfunctory manner. The brown tone which has been given the picture is generally pleasing, excepting where it degenerates into such broad lighting that it is almost white. In the main it is good, and possibly minor defects should be overlooked.

"Caught at Last."—A comedy from the Vitagraph studio which illustrates the pranks of a mischievous boy and emphasizes the uncertainty of circumstantial evidence. But even though this uncertainty is admitted there is little uncertainty about what happened to Willie when in the last scene his father is represented as cutting, trimming and carefully testing a substantial switch.

"Historical Fans."—A beautiful film from the Gaumonts illustrating the history of the fan. Its chief objection is that few will understand the meaning of the panoramic pictures shown. Adam and Eve appears to be understood by everyone, but the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the sixteenth century and modern use are all alike somewhat obscure, and a larger proportion will never know what the pictures mean. A legend explaining each one would have made the series much more satisfactory. The technical quality and the coloring are alike beyond criticism.

"A Strong Diet."—A rather rough-house film from the Gaumont studio which shows what might occur from eating bull meat. The destruction which accompanies the action is scarcely to be commended. Perhaps it should not be condemned, but the picture does not possess the delicate humor which is a characteristic of many Gaumont comedies.

"Buying Manhattan Island."—An Edison historical film which is timely, this year being the three hundredth anniversary of Henry Hudson's discovery of the Hudson River. The dramatic episode of purchasing Manhattan Island for $24 and the ill-concealed joy of the Indians at obtaining so many goods for so little value is convincingly illustrated, but the panoramic view of New York to-day, which shows what the Dutch really bought, is a missed opportunity.

"Cupid's Four Darts."—A beautifully colored film from the Pathes, with the scenario remarkably impressive and attractive, even for the Pathes. The steps of the temple, with the massive columns rising to the roof of the porch, and the grouping of the figures makes a particularly engaging picture.

"The Dog Detective."—A Pathe which affords opportunity to exhibit a trained dog. But even though some interest attaches to this feature of the picture it must be admitted that the dog's action is not convincing. Fortunately there are no murders, though a man is abducted and the criminals are punished in the end. The staging and photographic quality are alike pleasing, but the picture has not so many of the Pathe qualities as some others.

"The Little Angel of Roaring Springs."—A Western drama from the Kalem studio which has elements not heretofore introduced. The principal scenes are typical. Where the rough miners refuse to give the evangelist money for his church they are representing what would probably happen under similar circumstances. When they reward the evangelist's bravery in saving the little boy's life with almost unlimited money, they are equally natural. The emotional features of the wild life in such environment are clearly depicted. Technically the picture is an improvement on some of the Kalem productions.

HERE'S THE VERY LATEST.

Have you tried the newest fad at your theater—a real Baby Show? The largest picture houses have, with great success. From all reports this is positively the best hot weather attraction ever introduced in a moving picture theater, and managers who have tried same report it a certain "money-getter." If you want the mothers, their little ones and their many friends to pack your house day after day, just start a baby show; you'll get plenty of free advertising out of it and without question make money in the bargain. For full information and particulars write to the Novelty Slide Company, 221 East Fifty-third street, promoters of moving picture baby shows.

The regular meeting of the Picture Machine Branch Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., was held at Gallagher's Hall, 402 Eighth avenue, to an overflowing attendance. Fifteen new members were enrolled, while twenty-four are to take the examination on next Monday night at the union rooms, 402 Eighth avenue. Mr. Cartwright, the president, will represent the operators of New York and vicinity at the convention to be held at Springfield, Ohio, on July 5, 1909. The Greater New York Film Exchange, we are informed, will employ only union men. At the last meeting the proposition of candidates was held.

Fort Slocum, N. Y.—The Post Exchange at Fort Slocum, on the Sound, has installed a moving picture outfit. The shows are exceedingly popular with the soldiers at the port and will serve to furnish many a pleasant and instructive hour's entertainment while they are off duty. As will be seen in our advertising, they want the services of a singer and piano player for two evenings a week.

Annapolis, Md.—The Annapolis Amusement Company have leased the Criterion Bowling Alleys on Main street and are remodeling same at a cost of about $8,000. When completed, the building will contain a moving picture theater with seating capacity of 350 on the ground floor, and bowling alleys and poolrooms in basement. Mr. J. Boyd Dexter is manager of the new enterprise.

The Brookside-Fulton Amusement Company is the title of a new firm operating with Samuel Bullock as manager and Herman Spillner treasurer. Mr. Bullock has successfully conducted The Grand, opposite Lorain avenue market house, for two years, and is well and favorably known among the fraternity in Ohio; incidentally, Sam is the author of the big song hit, "Billy Boy, the Kidnapped Child." The firm opens a new Summer theater, "The Brookside Airdome," June 16th. The office is 304 Superior building, Cleveland, O.

The Chicago Song Slide Company is making sad inroads on the rental customers of some of the dispensers of junk in the East. No less than sixty moving picture theaters between New York and Buffalo formerly renting their song slides in New York now take service from the Chicago concern.

OPEN AIR THEATERS FOR FIFTH AVENUE.

Plans have been filed with Building Superintendent Murphy for two open air theaters for moving picture exhibitions to be built for A. W. Rassmussen and A. S. Underwood respectively on the two vacant lots on Fifth avenue, one at the northwest corner of 125th street and its companion at the northeast corner of 116th street. The drawings in each case show rows of seats ranged in front of platforms containing fireproof booths for the shelter of the operators and the picture machines, before which fireproofed sheets will be stretched. Theaters of this sort will be a novelty in Manhattan.

Kearney, Neb.—Morn Brothers have opened a new moving picture theater here.

Hanover, Kan.—Wm. Schropp has purchased the interest of Doc Jones in the Electric Theater.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Harry P. Schneider, builder, is taking estimates on an amusement hall for Forty-ninth street.

Wymore, Neb.—J. D. Kite, of this city, has purchased the Majestic Moving Picture Theater at Washington, Kan., of F. N. Hotaling of this city, and has taken possession.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EDUCATION OF OPERATORS.

Harry H. Lamount Company,
Moving Picture Operators' School,
467 Eighth avenue.

New York, June 11, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—If you can find space in your valuable paper and care to publish the following, perhaps it may do some good towards improving the present conditions and ability of all first-class picture operators. As you perhaps know, nearly all exhibitors and renters are complaining of poor operators, both in regard to poorly projected pictures and the daily destroying of valuable film through ignorance or carelessness of these same operators. The operator that has the ability to properly assemble and keep correctly adjusted his machine, does not strip sprocket holes for from 50 to 300 feet of first run film and does not have jumpy or flickery pictures, is badly wanted. I suggest that our Hon. Mayor take the same steps as did the State licensed commissioner in Massachusetts, which was that all present operators' permits be called in and declared null or void, then have each and every operator pass a new examination before a board of practical and expert men in the operating line. There are a number of such men in New York working every day that could and would do the examining of these young men to the satisfaction of all and for the benefit of all. There are positions open at all times for these kind of men with a good salary attached. Why is it that a man of seven or eight years' experience at both road and permanent, when he applies for a permit in New York is turned down with the excuse that there are too many operators in the market loafing, so they do not care to grant any more permits? Why is it that some of the largest rental exchanges make personal inquiries for operators and advertise in daily paper for operators, when at almost any time in the day from five to twenty young men with New York cards are loafing around the film department of these same exchanges? The answer is, they will not trust their film or machine to "Crank Turners," so-called, because they do not know how to protect their film from injury and in case of machine breakdown do not know what to do in regard to the repairing of same.

Hoping some other operators will say a word on this subject soon, I am,

Yours truly,
PROF. H. KELLEY.

P. S.—I think a few words on this subject by F. H. Richardson, whom we all know by his excellent lessons, would be appreciated by all operators.—H. K.

[No doubt friend Richardson will respond with a few words.—Editor M. P. W.]

THE WAGES OF M. P. EMPLOYEES.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Is there any way to reach operators so as to enrol them as adherents to a uniform salary schedule? In the eyes of the Electrical Department and the Board of Fire Underwriters an operator must be A MAN, intelligent, capable, qualified, responsible. He cannot get a license unless he is of proper age and has a knowledge that qualifies him to give efficient service.

If the operator holds a responsible position, if the safety of the audience and perfect results upon the canvas count for anything, he should get a living salary. He must pay rent, have clothes, keep up the living expenses of his family. How can this be done if he is not recognized according to his actual value to the show?

A bureau sent an operator for a situation to a high class show house in this city, people who do a standing room business. The success of every show and their grip on future business is dependent on the care, intelligent, scientific work of the man at the machine.

Listen to the conversation between the carefully groomed uniformed gentleman in charge, and the man with careful training and years of experience to make the work on the screen as perfect as knowledge, training and experience could make it:

"Your name is Mr. C——?"

"Yes. I have called in reference to position as operator, sent by such and such a bureau. The position pays but $12.00 per week. What is the highest wage you pay head operators?"

"Fourteen dollars."

"I cannot accept such wages; my salary has been $25.00 and $35.00 per week."

It is certainly a cruel wrong to skilled labor for a great show company like the one mentioned to refuse to pay for value received. It is a fierce setback to every operator in the business to have the price, a beggar's pittance, set by a single firm to be followed by thousands of exhibitors or managers of amusements halls and theaters.

Self-preservation is the first law of life.

If operators get together and sign a schedule of $18.00 for six days, $21.00 for seven days, $25.00 on the road, it will be a fair living. If operators refuse to work until their schedule is complied with a better day will come for the operator. As he now stands greed has him by the throat. The hours are long, the conditions under which he works uncomfortable and unhealthy. Let a representative of the Board of Health try to stay in a booth one day and they would be convinced that the exactions and restrictions safeguarding an absolutely fireproof machine are ridiculous.

But such restrictions and exactions are needful to enable a cheap service to life, also to give work to the kindergarten operator who knows only to turn a crank after a scientific mechanician has made ready everything. Operators, real operators, must get together, must have self-protecting laws enacted, must require a fair, just salary for safe skilled labor.

Listen now to a concluding word. Who is to blame for theater managers and owners growing wealthy out of beggarly pay for their artists' services.

Pianists and singers and operators, listen to the answer: You are to blame. Who made Standard oil kings? The people who bought the oil. The people did it. Who makes the humble wage you receive? You fix the price. The people hate the trust with its oppression, yet they made it.

The people cry out in amazement over the meanness of great popular show houses, yet the answer is for you to make. Do you want decent wages? Then don't make scandalous wages possible by accepting them.

This is up to pianists, singers, operators. The answer: Get together, fix your wage scale, stand by it if the heavens fall. It is your duty to yourself. These facts cannot be regarded as idle reflections. An organized army safeguards the country, so organization which reaches every operator, pianist, singer will adjust the wage scale to just compensation.

LANTERN PROJECTION DISTANCES.

By H. W. Griggs, Portage, Wis.

The usual published tables of size of disc for a given distance from screen with a 3-inch slide for different focus lenses in projection are perhaps near enough for all ordinary exhibition purposes, but not sufficiently so for accurate projection calculations. The tables give a constant ratio between disc and distance same as a pinhole lens would give, whereas the conjugate focus of an objective naturally increases the disc greater in proportion than the distance calls for, amounting to nearly 18 inches for a 21-foot disc with a half-size objective, as per the table herewith from actual measurements by the writer. The 73-foot floor of the Portage Armory was selected and experiments made through the courtesy of Company F, Third Regiment, some of the members of which kindly assisted with the measurements. The alternating 10-ampere arc lamp was used in the lantern. The objective was half size, 9¼-inch equivalent solar focus according to the one-fourth equal image distance formulæ.

Table of Lantern Projection Distances

Screen to Objective Diaphragm	Lesser Conjugate Focus	Diameter of Disc	Same from 2⅞ in. Slide	Times Enlargement	Ratio 3 in. Slide to Conjugate Focus	Disc for Published Tables 3 in. Slide
Ft.	Inches	Ft. In.	Ft. In.			Ft. In.
10	10.00	3.00	2.10½	12	3.333	3.00
20	9.60	6.03	6.00	25	3.200	6.00

The slide was a hymn with words and music full field, having a 3-inch mat exact, focusing sharp at half way from center to edge. As a slide with a 3-inch mat opening is a rarity, and 2⅞-inch horizontal the almost universal width, a column is also given for discs from this width, which ranges tolerably close enough to the usual tables for ordinary purposes. The ratio of slide to focus should be the same as disc to distance, and is closely so.

MOVING PICTURES OF THE INVISIBLE.

Our European contemporaries record some experiments, made at Dresden, in photographing rapidly moving objects in the moving picture camera. There are many movements, particularly those of certain parts of machinery, so rapid that they cannot be seen, and far less analysed by the naked eye. For the purpose of studying the phases of such rapid movements—more particularly those of projectiles such as bullets—attempts have been made to secure records by means of the kinematograph camera, but owing to the fact that the latter cannot work beyond a certain speed the results have not been satisfactory, a rifle bullet covering some 20 meters in the time required to take a single picture in the kinematograph camera. So far, therefore, the actual process by which a bullet splinters a bone or penetrates a target had not been recorded graphically.

At the exhibition in question the Military High School of Charlottenburg send a number of kinematograph records taken at a speed so much in excess of anything previously recorded that the photographing of the invisible may be said to be an accomplished fact.

"The ballistic kinematograph," as the instrument which makes these results possible is called, is the invention of Privy Councillor Cranz of Berlin, and takes no less than 5,000 pictures per second. The secret is the use for illumination purposes of the electric spark, as it is already used for high speed photography, each spark representing a fresh picture. The pictures are, of course, in silhouette; but they give, nevertheless, a wonderfully clear idea of the rapid movements of the objects photographed. A correspondent thus describes the reproduction of "ballistic kinematograph" records of a bone being penetrated by a rifle bullet fired at normal speed:

"First we see the bone hanging free. The bullet seems to approach it gradually, pierces the bone, and proceeds on its path. We see as a slow process the splitting of the bone; out of the rifle close by we see the powder gases issue." Another exhibition is given of firing into a bladder filled with water. "The bladder extends monstrously in the direction of the shot and finally bursts." Other displays show parts of the powder gases leaving the mouth of a gun before the shot.

The practical value of the invention is in the clear way in which it shows defects in firearms and ammunition. To give only one instance, it shows grains of powder which have escaped combustion issuing from the muzzle. How rapidly the mechanism works is shown by the fact that thirty distinct pictures were taken of a hand moved as quickly as possible through the air before it had covered a distance of 1.9 centimeters.

The individual films are of the same size as those used in the ordinary kinematograph, and the pictures are described as having perfectly clear outlines. The apparatus may be used for speed-testing purposes and for ascertaining the dynamic loss caused by impact of projectiles with obstacles. An extended use promised is in examining machinery for defects which militate against smooth working. Apart from such mechanical uses the new kinematograph promises to be of value in abstract science, for studying the rapid movements on the wings of insects, and in various physico-chemical processes which take place at a speed too great for examination by the naked eye.

Cowboy's Narrow Escape

A thrilling western story with genuine Indian man and woman as leading characters. Also a leading Cowboy who held the roping champion of Oklohoma for five years.

SYNOPSIS

A troop of cowboys dash up to a Western saloon. An Indian boy comes in and they treat him to whiskey. His sister comes in and dashes the bottle from his hand. Bad Bill is about to strike him, when one of the cowboys, who is something of a gentleman, interferes and takes Bad Bill's gun from him. They all leave, and Bad Bill, who has taken Tom's gun from him, returns and robs the proprietor of the saloon, leaving him for dead. The Indian boy, who has returned for more whiskey, sees the crime through the window. Bad Bill discovers that he is seen and starts after the Indian boy, lossoes and drags him to a cliff, binds him and throws him over. Tom, the gentleman cowboy, also returns to the saloon for more whiskey and discovers the proprietor apparently dead. He finds the gun alongside of him. The other boys arrive and ask him what he has done. He is dazed and cannot answer. They take him out, drag him to a tree and hold a short trial. A bag of money is found on him which he has picked up outside of the saloon, and an empty shell discovered in his gun. They place a rope around his neck and start to hang him, when the Indian, who has been rescued by his sister, arrives and cuts him down. The Indian then accuses Bad Bill and tells how he saw the crime through the window. Then the Indian girl arrives with the proprietor of the saloon, who luckily was only slightly injured.

This is a very thrilling story and one which is sure to please the audience.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

WAS JUSTICE SERVED? Showing What Might Result from Circumstantial Evidence.—While the title of this Biograph subject is interrogatory, yet we feel the answer will be in the affirmative, for, as Goldsmith said: "Justice may be defined as that virtue which impels us to give every person what is his due." Thus justice, properly speaking, is the only virtue, and all the rest have their origin in it. Fate, that tantalizing dame, ofttimes takes cudgels against justice, but is nearly always the victor. Such is the theme of this story. George Wallace has just finished a term in prison, and, discarding the stripes for a civilian suit, he hurries to his home to be greeted by his wife, child and old mother. The meeting is most touching, the poor wife having, during his incarceration, eked a living for them by manual labor. Wallace decides to start a new life and leaves home in search of work. Armed with a newspaper, he looks up the employment offices advertised therein. During the course of his journey he brushes into a man who is returning to his pocket a well-filled wallet. The pocketbook falls to the ground and the parties pass on, ignorant of the occurrence. A moment later a chap passes the spot and grabbing up the wallet hurries from the scene, taking a byway into another neighborhood. Reaching a lonely section of the street, he examines the find, takes the money and throws the wallet away. Now by a cruel trick of fate Wallace passes this way, picks up the purse and is examining it when the owner who has discovered his loss and remembers now of being bumped into by Wallace, comes up, and the evidence certainly looks verifying, so Wallace is arrested. The case is brought to trial before a jury and by a singular fortuity the finder of the money is impaled on the jury. This would seem another subtle trick of derisive fate, for the man himself is not cognizant of the nature of the case upon which he is to sit. You may imagine his amazement when he hears the testimony and is handed with the others the incriminating wallet. To anyone with the most meager powers of discernment the case looks clearly a case of theft against Wallace. What could be more convincing—his brushing against the plaintiff while in the act of returning the money to his pocket, and then being found with the wallet in his hand; worse still is the fact of his being an ex-convict. The retiring of the jury to their room seemed but as a matter of form, so you may imagine their surprise when the ballot results in eleven to convict and one to acquit. It is easy to guess who cast the one dissenting vote—the real offender. Arguments, entreaties, threats are all in vain; he stubbornly refuses to change his opinion. Well, they at length decide to give up the hope of agreeing, and are about to return to court, when the man calls them back, and under their promise of secrecy restores the money to the purse. They then file into court and to the surprise of all render a verdict of "not guilty." The wallet, with its contents, is secretly returned to the owner. Length, 962 feet.

THE MEXICAN SWEETHEARTS.—The experience of Tantalus was never so chafing as a tantalizing sweetheart. The strength of this is better understood when we realize the impetuous nature of the Latin type of person. The Senorita, to tease her sweetheart, pretends love for an American soldier, and for a while it looks as if the little detachment of soldiers would be forced to bestow the last military honors on one of their number. However, by a clever trick, Senorita rights the impending wrong; the soldier escapes without a scar, and the sweethearts are left enjoying their cigarettes. This subject, while being short, is one of the most beautiful pieces of high-class acting ever attempted, the leading character being played by a native Spaniard. Length, 309 feet.

THE PEACHBASKET HAT.—There is invariably a penalty attached to being popular, whether it be animate or inanimate things. The popular man will have his host of enemies, who are making trouble for him; the fragrant rose has its bothersome thorn; also the popular fad or fashion is eternally breeding trouble. No more popular fad has ever struck the feminine fancy than the peachbasket hat. This is a creation of headgear that for size outstrips anything yet designed by the disordered mind of the modiste. As a "skypiece" it is a "skyscraper," and in decoration it looks like a combination horticultural and food exhibition. Nevertheless, this mammoth "lid" was seized onto by the feminine world with the avidity of a boy for his first baseball suit. It is only natural that our friend, Mrs. Jones, should experience this obsession, and what woe it preambled! The Jones family are seated at breakfast. Mr. Jones is reading the morning paper. An account of a kidnapping by gypsies engages his attention, and he is filled with horror at the anticipation of the possible abduction of his young hopeful, a baby one year old. He tries to impress Mrs. J., but she is fascinated by the millinery "ads." The situation for Jones becomes more tense when on going outside he sees a couple of the odious gypsies with a child. Mrs. Jones takes herself off to buy a peachbasket, leaving baby in charge of the nurse, who, being of a romantic nature, enlists the services of the gypsies to tell her fortune. Mrs. Jones returns and almost catches the nursemaid, who is quite beside herself at her near discovery. Mrs. Jones places the huge box containing the hat on the table, while the nurse, placing the baby on the floor, assists in extricating the hat from its crate. Putting on the hat, Mrs. J. goes into the next room, followed by the maid, to view the effect in the mirror. Mr. Jones now arrives, and his first thought is for baby; he cares naught for the peachbasket hat. Baby is nowhere to be seen. The nurse, in her excitement, does not remember where she placed it. Through the house they rush fruitlessly; out on the road and on after the disappearing gypsies, who are overtaken only to find that the baby the woman carries is not a Jones. The clouds of despair o'ershadow the couple in their dining-room, when suddenly the hat box on the floor is seen to move. There, under the hollow cube of pasteboard, is found baby Jones, the box having been blown by a gust of wind off the table over the child. Length, 666 feet.

THE LOST INVITATION.—Mrs. Weston, of the "400," arranges a fancy dress masquerade ball. A pressing invitation is sent to Judge Bent, an old chum of her husband. The Judge, reviving the memories of his youth, gladly accepts and sends a letter informing his hostess of his coming.

Judge Bent spends some delightful hours considering various characters, finally deciding on the happy idea of going as a tramp. His costume arrives and the Judge is in the "seventh heaven" of delight and feels like a boy again.

The auspicious time arrives and the Judge sets forth for the ball, but, unfortunately, drops his wallet when entering his cab.

A genuine "Weary Willie," leisurely sauntering along enjoying his after-dinner cigar (and on the lookout for another), comes upon the pocketbook and the invitation.

Having known "better days," he resolves to use the invitation, with the prospect of getting something to eat and drink.

As he is already, perforce, suitably attired for the part, he hies him hence and finds no difficulty in obtaining admittance when he presents the invitation. Meanwhile, our portly friend, the Judge, has arrived at his destination in his assumed character, but, unable to pay the cabman, and losing his temper, he is hustled off to the station house, charged with attempting to defraud a cabby.

Our friend "Weary," at the ball, is having the time of his life. His perfect make-up and true-to-life actions make a hit, despite the corns stepped upon and the ladies' trains ruined. He is the center of attraction and affords untold amusement for the guests.

At the station house Judge Bent succeeds in untangling the web of misfortune, but, disgusted at his boyish enthusiasm, goes home, dons a dress suit and goes to Mrs. Weston's to explain.

His arrival and explanation put an end to "Weary's" good time. "Weary" resumes his wandering career, brimful of "eats" and "drinks" and pleasant reflections. App. length, 905 feet.

THE WHOLE WORLD KIN (A Drama of Childhood).—A story woven around an incident of the sort that makes all hearts beat in unison and interpreted almost exclusively by children are among the chief claims to interest in "The Whole World Kin." The acting of the children is clever and the manner in which these youngsters portray in pantomime the scenes and incidents of the plot will make the picture a subject of admiration as well as pleasure with any audience.

The natural democracy of children is well understood and a never-failing source of interest among all classes of people. It is this that constitutes the basic idea in "The Whole World Kin."

A rich little girl who remains in the automobile while her mother is paying a call, observes a crowd of poor children playing in the street. She is fascinated by their game and, the chauffeur being deep in the pages of a popular novel, stealthily leaves the machine and joins the children of the tenements. Forgetful of all but her pleasure, she follows her new-found playmates to a park and here one of the poor little girls accidentally falls into a pond. The other children run away screaming, but the rich girl plunges in after the drowning little one and drags her from death. Alone she helps the drenched child home and helps the "little mother" in that wretched abode in caring for the crying baby.

The wealthy mother traces her child to the tenement and finds her soothing the infant to slumber. Naturally, the family of poverty soon find their condition temporarily relieved, but to go into all the incidents of this charming tale would be to tell too much. Its simplicity is its greatest attraction and it cannot fail to be a feature wherever shown. App. length, 520 feet.

AN AFFAIR OF ART (A Merry Farce).—Fussy Mr. Dobson was a persistent art collector—when the frames were sufficiently handsome and the canvas sufficiently large to make him feel that he really was getting something for his money. A bargain price and a huge painting was a combination that found in Mr. Dobson a sure customer every time.

Twenty dollars was usually his limit in price, but when he discovered a marine in Hogg's art emporium covering nearly fifteen square feet of canvas and priced at only $22.98, he stretched his limit and bought it. It was too large a painting to pass by on account of a mere matter of $2.98.

He was certainly proud and happy when it was turned over to him; too proud to allow a wagon or a porter to transport the costly painting home. That delicate task he reserved for himself, and with what direful effects to his dignity, his clothing and his anatomy the mirth-provoking scenes in the picture well portray.

The mammoth painting was welcome nowhere on his way. With it Mr. Dobson was catapulted out of the Subway by an irate guard; he was ejected from the roof of a Fifth avenue stage with acrobatic consequences, and by cabmen, street-car conductors and the immediate supervisors of various other public conveyances was treated in similar manner. The painting was unwieldy, and even when he walked he got into trouble. He reached home at last, however, but to what end?

In his condition of nervous excitement he smashed nearly everything in the apartment, and at the finish, just when the painting seemed safe on the wall, it slipped from his hands, fell on his wife's head and was broken and torn to bits. The painting was ruined, also several hundred dollars' worth of furniture and bric-a-brac, as well as Mr. Dobson's best suit of clothes; his wife's temper was ruffled, and that was the end of "An Affair of Art." App. length, 480 feet.

A GOOD HEARTED POLICEMAN.—"It never rains, but it pours," is illustrated very forcibly in this series of cinematographic views.

Out of work and sickness in the family is not an unusual condition, but the measure of sorrow would certainly appear to be full when in order to have the prescription filled the mother borrows money from a relative and when she is about to pay for the medicine finds herself arrested for passing counterfeit money. An investigation reveals the destitute condition of the family, whereupon the officer is so moved to compassion that he substitutes a perfect coin for the false one and thus causes the vindication of the woman. Length, 372 feet.

THE TROUBLESOME LAMP-POST.—This is unquestionably the greatest spectacular comedy hit. One scene excels the other in production of action and effect.

A lamp-post on the back of an inebriate citizen is accidentally ignited and produces most remarkable effects in pyrotechnic display. Numerous conflagrations ensue and the fire department is given ample opportunity to display its skill. Length, 357 feet.

THE WRONG MEDICINE.—The servant of a chemist, wishing to avenge himself for an imaginary wrong, fills a number of empty bottles with water and places them with other bottles on the counter.

Shortly after the chemist prepares a prescription and mistakes the bottles, using of their contents, but when later he finds on the bottles a poison label he becomes gravely concerned as he fears that the patient will be poisoned. He gives chase in every possible manner and reaches his destination shortly after a dose of the medicine is taken. An antidote is administered and every measure to avert a catastrophe adopted. When later the concoction is analyzed it develops to be water and all are happy to be relieved of the anxiety. Length, 502 feet.

STUNG BY A BEE.—Spending a week-end holiday in the country the city chap fails to observe that he is preparing for a nap in close proximity to a bee-hive. He soon discovers the fact to his sorrow. His nose swells and directly acquires enormous proportions, causing a very ludicrous appearance. All possible means to remove the unsightly appendage proving unavailing, a miner is finally induced to try his handiwork. He places a charge and sets off a fuse which results in the removal of the troublesome nose.—Length, 377 feet.

WINNING A PRINCESS. The King of Corconia promises to give the hand of his daughter to whoever will kill the evil spirit, a monster haunting the mountains adjacent to his country.

Two men declare themselves as aspirants to the honors—one a warrior and the other a poet. The latter, however, is much in favor with the princess. The poet befriends a sorcerer and is rewarded with a magic arrow to enable him to accomplish his aim. In the conquest that follows the warrior is worsted, but the poet succeeds. On the return to the castle the poet is attacked while sleeping and the warrior makes claim to the reward. The sorcerer finds the young poet and gives him succor, which brings about his recovery, whereupon he returns to the castle and exposes the warrior, who is cast into prison while the poet receives all honors and the coveted reward—the hand of the princess. Length, 636 feet.

MRS. SIMPSON'S ATTRACTIVENESS. — Mrs. Simpson has a nervous contraction of the face that makes her smile to every man she meets. Aside from being very annoying to the lady it leads into serious complications, giving rise to considerable merriment. Her husband finally succeeds in making explanations which appease the anger of the litigants. Length, 272 feet.

FAMINE IN THE FOREST; Or, THE TRAPPER'S GRATITUDE.—The first scene gives us a view of the wild forest. Here in a little clearing near a small stream Trapper Steve has built himself a rough cabin. This he uses as his headquarters for several months of each year. Scattered within a radius of a day's journey from it are his numerous traps for the wild denizens of the forest. Now we see him returning from making the rounds of them. Worn out with his long tramp he stretches his tired body prone on the ground and in a few seconds is fast asleep. Up creeps an Indian with his marauding band. A sudden rush and he is overpowered. A savage blow with a tomahawk lays him senseless. Part of the band rush into the cabin to plunder it. Two seize brands from the fire and soon the little cabin is ablaze. Around the senseless man the savages dance in fiendish joy. Slowly Steve recovered from the effect of the tomahawk blow. Seizing the half conscious man and almost carrying him they hurry away with their captive to the bank of a river, where he is left to die of thirst at the rivers' edge, bound and helpless. A day and night of infinite length have passed over poor Steve's head. Worn out with his useless struggles, he lies limp on the sands. Along the path come Wanda, a young Indian maid, and her old father, Tall Eagle, the chief of his tribe. Wanda sees Steve. Her heart is touched by his sufferings. She appeals to her father. To gratify her Tall Eagle consents. Drawing his hunting knife he quickly cuts the thongs that bind the trapper.

It is now the early Spring of the next year after Trapper Steve was rescued by Tall Eagle and Wanda. The Winter has been one of bitter coldness and severity. The provisions of the tribe have long ago been exhausted and grim famine now stalks in their midst. Tall Eagle journeys to the whites for help and reaches the camp famished. The prospectors have suffered many petty annoyances from marauding Indians and conclude here is an opportunity for them to revenge themselves. Drawing their guns they soon have Tall Eagle doing a war dance for them. Now Trapper Steve comes in. He sees the Indian is suffering. Up goes his long hunting rifle and the prospectors are told to stop their torture. Tall Eagle turns to see who his new friend is and recognizes Steve. He crawls to him for protection. Steve now recognizes his liberator. In a few broken words Tall Eagle tells of his tribe's suffering. Steve orders Mike to bring bread for the straving man. The big-hearted prospectors hearing Tall Eagle's story from Steve are now as eager to help Tall Eagle as they were to worry him a few moments ago.

Down the path leading from the settlement come Tall Eagle and Steve. Mounted on Steve's horse and with a bag of provisions behind them, they are hurrying to save the Indians ere it is too late.

Back in the Indian village the end of the long struggle is in sight. Only a few of the strongest remain alive. At last help is here. Steve and Tall Eagle arrive. But, alas! too late to save his people. The old warrior makes his way to the side of his dead squaw and falls beside her in silent grief. Slowly raising himself he thanks Steve for having tried to save them and leaves Wanda in his care. The old chieftain has brought aid but at the cost of his life. Enfeebled by privation and broken hearted with grief he falls lifeless across the body of his dead squaw. Only Wanda remains of the once prosperous tribe. Steve, remembering how she saved his life, draws her to him and resolves by loving care to blot out the sad remembrance of the tragic end of her parents and people.

NEVER AGAIN.—Being firm believers in the old adage that "A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men" we present a short comedy film telling of an adventure that befell Mr. Gayboy, a giddy old flirt, and of how he was beautifully "stung" at its conclusion.

THROUGH SHADOW TO SUNSHINE.—A distinguished gathering is present at Lord Avalon's castle. Suddenly Lord Avalon enters, stops the music and tells his guests that speculation in gold mines has made him penniless. At once the guests remember pressing engagements and one by one they leave the house under vague excuses.

Only one remains, Earl, a lad of about 23, who is in love with Dolly, the Lord's daughter. The Lord pays off his servants and then, as poor as his poorest servant, leaves for California, accompanied by Dolly and Earl.

Two months later they arrive at Rocky Camp. Blind Mike, the terror of the camp, tries to get fresh with Dolly, but he is promptly floored by her father. Blind Mike swears revenge.

Three years have passed. Lord Avalon with the assistance of Earl, has made his mines pay. Blind Mike, knowing that much gold is hidden in the cabin, hires two outlaws to strike down the Lord and rob him of his hard earned gold. Mike's wife is an unwilling witness to the plot. Dolly had been very good to her and she does not wish to see Dolly's father harmed. She follows the outlaws and witnesses the black deed. The three strike down Lord Avalon and steal important papers, besides all the gold they can find.

Blind Mike then accuses Earl of having com mitted the crime. The enraged miners are just preparing to string him up, when Bessie, Blind Mike's wife, comes to tell the truth and thus liberates Earl. The miners now go after Blind Mike and his two accomplices and they are soon swinging from the highest tree.

Lord Avalon recuperated. He sells his mines, the young couple are married and Bessie accompanies them as housekeeper to their old home. Length, 885 feet.

CURING A JEALOUS HUSBAND.—Mr. Newlywed is of a very jealous disposition, and thus makes his darling little wife most unhappy. He kicks the ice man out of the house, he fights the milk man, he gets after the letter carrier and even cools his temper on the garbage collector.

In her despair, the young wife invites her friend to come and help her cure her jealous husband. The young lady arrives and the two at once lay out a plan to effect a sure cure.

A dummy of a man is made and the same placed in the wardrobe of the sleeping room. The next morning the young wife flirts with the ice man. The husband appears and is furious. Imagine his surprise when the ice man is a great big fellow, and instead of punishing the ice man, Mr. Newlywed gets a good trouncing. The same happens to him by the milk man, by the coal man and by the garbage collector. The young lady having ordered big, strong men to do the delivering on this particular day.

Not enough with these lessons, the young wife pretends to have received a male visitor. She runs up to the bed room, stands before the wardrobe and refuses her husband to open the wardrobe. Now he is sure of the presence of a man in the house. He opens the wardrobe, the dummy falls into his arms. He wrestles with the intruder until the dummy falls apart and he sees he has been made the target of his wife's and her friend's wit. He apologizes and from all appearances he is cured forever of his jealousy. Length, 605 feet.

FLOSSIE'S NEW PEACH-BASKET HAT.—Flossie ordered a new hat. The milliner brings an enormously large box wherein is the new peach-basket hat with its trimmings. While Flossie leaves the room, Bridget enters and seeing the basket and fruit thinks the huckster left the goods in the sitting room instead of the kitchen. She puts the trimmings in the hat, carries it in the kitchen, puts the trimmings in the ice chest and uses the hat for a waste-basket.

Flossie's little brother makes use of the hat, so does the little sister. The father, too, gets some use out of the new hat, and it would just have been thrown out of the house had not Flossie returned in time.

She gathers the trimmings and what is left of the hat, takes it to her room and then does what young ladies do generally, if they do not know what to do: she lies down and cries.

In the meantime a good fairy trims the hat and when Flossie arises she is delighted to see before her the very latest Paris creation of a new peach-basket hat. Length, 275 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

FOR HIS DAUGHTER'S SAKE.—In this beautifully colored picture we are presented with a pathetic little story of human interest which shows the dominating influence of a father's love for his little daughter, who is in a weak physical condition. The poor man lives alone with the little one and while he is at work there is no one to care for the sick child nor administer the proper care and nourishment which would tend to restore the invalid to her normal condition. One day the doctor informs the father that the only manner in which he can expect to save the child's life is an immediate change of climate and plenty of good nourishment. The poor man, who is without funds, is at his wits' end in trying to figure out a possibility of complying with the doctor's wishes. When left alone in the office of his employer, the temptation to take some cash which does not belong to him, masters the man, and he reluctantly yields, and helps himself to a large sum. Returning home, he immediately bundles up the child, and carrying her in his arms down to the wharf, sets sail for foreign lands.

In the next picture we see the same couple ten years later, when through his diligence the man has attained control of a large factory and now that fortune smiles upon him, he does not forget the obligation which he owes to his former employer, so one day he sends a check covering the shortage. Soon after he and his daughter, who now has developed into a charming young lady, return to their native land, and in the course of events the daughter happens to meet and fall in love with the son of the man whom her father robbed. Everything bids fair for their future happiness until one day her prospective father-in-law calls upon her, and when presented to her father the dignified old patriarch recognizes the man whom he once employed and found to be a thief. Although the money has been returned, the stain of guilt rests heavily upon the character of the repentant man and his former friend turns his back upon him and leaves the place. The daughter, who has never known of the affair, is horrified upon hearing the strange story, and to make matters worse, her fiance informs her that their engagement is broken off. This upsets the young lady to such a degree that she has a complete nervous breakdown and her father, realizing that he is to blame for all writes a letter to his avowed enemy telling him that for his daughter's sake he is willing to sacrifice his life in order to expedite the young people's happiness, he intends committing suicide. Upon receiving the missive the man becomes softened, and taking his son goes to the home of his former employee, arriving there just in time to prevent the distracted man from carrying out his threat. The young people are again united and the fathers forget the past and clasping each other's hand they swear eternal friendship. Length, 836 feet.

THE GRANDFATHER. In the opening scene we behold a group of bereaved peasants returning from the cemetery where they have just attended the obsequies and assisted in placing in its last resting place the body of Michael Hans, a French patriot, who died fighting for his country. While the good people are extending their sympathy to the little son and the aged father of the deceased, a group of Prussian soldiers, who are ravaging the country, come along and boisterously break up the sorrowful conclave, forcing the people to scatter in all directions. The old father, Mathias Hans, broken in spirit over the loss of his son, dolefully returns with his grandson to his lonesome little home where he gives vent to his feelings and swears vengeance on his enemies who were responsible for the death of his son. The little grandson, William, who is old enough to realize what a loss he has sustained, is as passionately desirous of revenge as the old man. The little fellow in his rage seizes a rifle and is about to leave the house to avenge the death of his father, but the old man disarms the lad and sends him off to bed; after which he bolts up the house and retires himself for the night. When all is still the boy steals from his room and seeing his grandfather sound asleep, picks up a pair of nippers, quietly sneaks out of the house and bolts away through the lonely wood. He has determined upon a plan of revenge and we see him climbing a telegraph pole and severing the wires, thus cutting off all communication with the enemy. In the midst of the operation some Prussian soldiers happen to pass, and seeing the little fellow at his task, demand of him to come down from his elevated position. When they realize what the lad is up to they become so enraged that they brutally bind him to the pole and leave him there to die.

Old Mathias is awakened in the night by the cold wind blowing upon him through the open door and knowing that he bolted it before retiring, he gets up to investigate, and to his great horror discovers the absence of his grandson. As the old man is leaving the house to go in search of the youngster, he is met by the soldiers who, detaining him, demand some drink. The helpless old fellow, although boiling with rage, acquiesces and as he is offering them his scant hospitality one of the party throws a muffler in his face, which the latter recognizes as one belonging to his grandson. Realizing that ill has befallen the latter, he steals away from his unwelcome guests and goes in search of the body, only to find, after a short time, his lifeless form strung up to the pole. Heartbroken the poor man takes the inanimate form in his arms and carefully carries it back to the old home, and makes his way to an old shed where he hides the body. Having reached the limit of his patience, and trembling with rage and grief, old Mathias determines this time to be avenged for the wrongs heaped upon him. Taking a jug of wine he mixes some deadly poison in it, after, which he enters the house and places the vintage before his unruly guests and invites them to partake of it, telling them that it is some of his private stock of excellent quality. One of the soldiers proposes that their host shall join them, whereupon the old man becomes disconcerted, but manages to retain his gravity, although he knows that a drink of the venomous stuff means instant death. He lifts his cup, however, and raises it to his lips, whereupon one of the party in a most uncourteous manner knocks it from his hand and informs him that they prefer drinking alone. Unsuspecting, the party drain their cups and quench their thirst for the last time, for instantly the deadly potion does its work and one by one the burly soldiers fall dead upon the floor. His work accomplished, old Mathias places the body of his grandson upon the table and turning his face heavenward gives thanks that he was given the opportunity to avenge his dead. Length, 1,062 feet.

AN AFFAIR OF HONOR.—A gay young flirt while strolling down the street happens to spy a very pretty young woman, and being impressed with her charming appearance he makes an attempt to enter into a conversation with her, but she will have none of him. Not to be discouraged he follows her for a short distance and when she sits on a bench he boldly plants himself beside her and tells her of his infatuation. Soon another fellow comes along and takes a seat upon the same bench, and before long he has something to say to the young lady, who indignantly repulses him for his effrontery, whereupon the first fellow assumes the role of her indignant escort, and remonstrates with the stranger. The two men enter into a heated conversation and before long challenge one another to settle the affair by the code of honor. They start out and engage their seconds, after which they retire to a desolate part of the woods where they make preparations to fight a duel. Both fellows are amateurs in the use of the foils and one appears afraid of the other, and they are an amusing pair in their vain efforts to stand their ground. Finally the little fellow, feeling that he has had enough bolts away from the crowd and leads his rival a merry chase through the woods. As a last resort he climbs a tree, but his opponent, determined to continue the fight, sits under the tree to wait for him to come down, which he eventually does, and through the intercession of the young woman they make up and all become good friends. Length, 440 feet.

AN ASSORTMENT OF AEROPLANES.—This picture will be extremely interesting at the present time when so much is being done to further the possibilities of aerial navigation. The Wright brothers seem to stand first in the ranks of genius, as will be readily seen in this picture, when one stops to compare their great achievements with other so-called wonders. In the first picture we see the workshops at Bellancourt, where most of the aeroplanes were made. Next we see Santos Dumont, Kapferer and Archdeacon assisting at the first experiment of Delagrange and it is interesting to note the different types of machines. We then get a good view of Farman's aeroplane in flight, also Breuget's and Antoinette's, all considered master-

JOAN OF ARC.—In this beautiful and wonderfully acted picture we present some of the principal incidents connected with the eventful life of the Maid of Orleans. In the opening picture we see Joan as a peasant girl wandering carefree through the meadows and living a tranquil life among the simple country folks. Her country is besieged in war and she being a patriot and a very religious girl, hears heavenly voices and St. Michael appears before her, telling her to go to see the King and save her country from the enemy. Joan tells her parents of the visions which she saw, but they are amazed at her strange actions and try to persuade her that it is only imagination. Finally they consent to her carrying out her purpose, and she takes her departure from her home and goes with Captain Beaudricourt to see the King. Upon hearing of the strange girl, the King is prone to be skeptical and as a test of her sincerity, he places a substitute on the throne to receive Joan. The latter through her supernatural powers discovers the deception and goes over to the King, who is keeping in the background. She falls on her knees before him and begs to be given charge of the army to lead them on to victory, telling the King that it is divine providence which sends her to him. The King becomes convinced of her sincerity and in the presence of the amassed multitude he complies with her request.

In the next picture we see Joan entering Orleans at the head of the army and attacking the famous towers and after a fierce fight they put the enemy to rout. Next we see Joan triumphantly entering the great cathedral at Rheims where Charles VII. is crowned King.

Finally, at Campiegne, Joan is captured by the enemy and thrown into prison, where she is charged with being a sorceress and condemned to death, and in the last picture we see her being burned at the stake in Rouen, May 14, 1431. Length, about 800 feet.

A COUNTRY GIRL'S PERIL.—Tom Hooper, a village blacksmith, had for some time been courting the daughter of old John Burton, a well-to-do farmer living a couple of miles from the village of Grey Oak. The opening scene shows Tom spending the evening at the Burton's. Patiently waiting until the old man and his wife are sleeping and have gone to bed, Tom in fear and trembling, pops the question to Eliza, and receives that pretty young lady's promise to become his wife. He is so elated over his good fortune that he cannot refrain from shouting, which brings old John rushing down the stairs to learn the cause of the racket. When Tom stammers out the cause of his sudden burst of joy, the old man gives his consent to the engagement of his only daughter to the sturdy blacksmith, and returns once more to his bed after informing Tom that it was getting late and time all honest folks were "to hum."

With a parting hug and a resounding kiss, the prospective bridegroom starts for the village. His path lies along the country road, and striding along, whistling a familiar hymn, he stumbles onto an automobile party whose machine has broken down, leaving them afoot in the country 25 miles from their city home.

Young James Lawrence, the son of a wealthy manufacturer, is the owner of the car, and the party consists of his invited guests. Anxiously inquiring of Tom whether or not accommodations could be found for the night for his party, he receives the reply that there is not a regular hotel within five miles of that spot, but that perhaps his friend Mr. Burton could take care of them until morning. Positive that the car could not be repaired for several hours, the stranded party are only too willing to follow the blacksmith to the farmhouse, where after rousing the household, Tom asks for shelter for the belated wayfarers. Old Burton shies at the ladies, but finally agrees to stow them all away.

While they are discussing the problem of accommodating so large a party, James' eyes fall on the graceful form and beauty of Eliza, who blushing at the handsome city chap's gaze, drops her eyes in maidenly modesty, and in her simplicity presents so charming a picture to the blase young rone that he secretly makes up his mind to possess her—the most beautiful country girl he has ever seen.

The stay of the city folks is only for a few hours, but in that time the damage has been done. Eliza, dazzled by the dress and manners of the ladies of the party, and fascinated by the smooth and polished manner of the young club man, forgets the honest love of poor Tom and gives herself up to dreams of wealth and splendor that to her simple mind seem the only road to complete happiness.

Before bidding her good-bye, James presses her hand and sets her heart to fluttering when he whispers in her ear the admiration he feels for her grace and beauty. "I shall return before long, my little country flower," says James. "In the meantime think of me as one who has at last found the woman to whom he could devote his whole life." Springing into the auto he is driven away, leaving a maiden so bewildered by what he has said that she is utterly unconscious of her surroundings until the sharp voice of her mother calls her to her household duties.

It is not long before Tom notices the changed manner of his sweetheart, but in his frank, honest nature he has no suspicion of anything out of the way, until one day, while the Burtons are at the village, James Lawrence rolls up in his auto, and seeing the blushing Eliza, springs from the car and all but clasps her in his arms. Tom notices, with rapidly growing jealousy, the look of supreme happiness on the girl's face, and after James has gone on to the hotel, promising to call for Eliza that evening and take her for a ride, he questions her concerning her extraordinary interest in the handsome stranger. Excited by the events of the last few minutes, the foolish girl turns on the blacksmith and tells him that he has no right to question her actions, that she is her own mistress and will not be accountable to him or any one else. Turning on her heel, she rushes away, leaving the poor fellow dumbfounded and utterly at a loss to understand her meaning.

True to his promise, the auto rolls up in front of the Burton home at the appointed time, and James, lifting the blushing girl into the car, orders the chauffeur to drive back towards the village. On the road they pass the blacksmith, who is hastening to the Burton's after his day's work is done, to try, if possible, to fathom the mystery of Eliza's treatment of him. Recognizing her in the whirling car, the realization of his sweetheart's danger comes to him, and for a moment staggers him. "I'll save her. God help her. I'll save her yet," moans the heartbroken blacksmith as he hurries on to the farmer's home.

Now, Eliza, knowing that Tom saw her, becomes frightened, and asks to be taken home. James realizes that he must act quickly, so in his most persuasive manner, he soon, by promises of marriage and wealth, induces the bewildered girl to consent to an immediate elopement. Leaving her, with instructions to meet him at nine o'clock that evening on the country road near the farm, he rides away to his hotel, elated over so easy a victory.

As Eliza steps inside the gate she is met by the pale but determined blacksmith, who demands to know the truth concerning herself and the city chap who had come like a thief in the night to destroy his happiness. Again he receives a rebuff that staggers him and leaves him powerless.

That night, on coming into the house after doing the chores about the farm, old man Burton finds a letter on the sitting-room table addressed to himself. Opening it, he slowly reads:

"Dear Daddy:—I am to be married to Mr. Lawrence. He loves me and can make me happy. Tom never could. Good-bye, and forgive your Eliza."

Scarcely able to believe his eyes, the old farmer summons his son Ike, and giving him the note, bids him run with all speed to Tom's house and warn him of Eliza's danger. Saddling his horse, Tom starts, by a short cut, to head off the couple before they can reach the city.

In the meantime, Eliza has stolen away from the farm and made her way to the waiting lover, who, jubilant over his conquest, has been imbibing too freely of liquor. Seizing the shrinking girl roughly in his arms, he laughs loud and boisterously, at the same time offering her a drink from a flask of whisky he is holding in his hand. Now Eliza had been brought up in a strictly temperate community, and had always looked upon a drinking man as something to be shunned above all else. Using all her strength, she pushes the intoxicated roue from her, and the realization of his true character almost overcomes her. She staggers, and would fall, but the unscrupulous libertine, determined not to be cheated of his prey, seizes her around the waist, and lifting her into the car, orders the chauffeur to go ahead with all speed.

Riding desperately through the night, Tom comes out into the main road just in time to see the approach of the rushing car. Springing forward with the agility of a panther, the powerful blacksmith grasps the brass railing on the rear of the swiftly passing auto, and drawing himself up over the back, hurls his whole weight upon the astonished but now thoroughly frightened villain. "You dog," thunders the mighty smith, as his fingers close about the throat of the cringing James. Choking his adversary into insensibility, he orders the chauffeur to stop, which he promptly does. Lifting the unconscious form of the clubman, he drags him to the road, then tells the scared chauffeur to return at once to the Burton home if he values his life. He supports the fainting form of Eliza in his arms, and upon the arrival of the car at the old farmhouse, Tom carries his precious burden into the house, where, recovering from the shock of her experience, she begs forgiveness for the mistake of her life, and rewards the faithful fellow who had rescued her by declaring that she would hereafter devote her life in making him a true and loyal wife.

The chauffeur quickly returns for his master, who sobered by his recent peril, swears that never will that part of the country see him again.

THE CURSE OF COCAINE.—Recent police investigations in the large cities into the indiscriminate distribution of cocaine by druggists of shady character, are resulting in most appalling revelations. The wide spreading growth of the use of this drug, especially among the poorer class, is unparalleled, and, although the police are making heroic efforts to check it, it continues to take its toll of thousands of human lives each year, despite the fight against it.

"The Curse of Cocaine" is a powerful dramatic story on this great subject, bearing a warning and a moral.

Dr. Warren Harris, a prominent city physician, performs an operation upon a patient, whose suffering he endeavors to relieve by administering cocaine. This shows the great virtue of the drug, for, when administered scientifically, it kills pain without working serious injury to the nervous system. Shortly after the patient leaves, Dr. Harris is called to the bedside of another patient. In his haste he leaves the poison in a conspicuous place on the center table, where it is found later by his wife Katherine. The woman's curiosity tempts her to sample the drug. The peculiar exhilarating effects of the first trial tempt her to repeat the dose until she falls unconscious on the floor. This is the beginning of the tragedy.

Repeated trips to the medicine case holding the vial of cocaine does the work, and, a month later, when Dr. Harris again has occasion to use the drug, he finds the vial empty. Not daring to suspect his wife or the servants, he leaves the mystery unsolved and goes out to buy more. During his absence his wife enters, goes to the case, but, to her dismay, finds the nerve soother has been exhausted. Her husband enters at this moment and the mystery of the vanishing cocaine is immediately made clear. She confesses and in despair begs for pardon. He scolds her severely, warns her of the death's valley she is entering and makes her swear never to touch the drug again.

The great craving for the drug, however, proves more powerful than her resolution, and finding that her husband has hidden the deadly vial and its contents, she resorts to subterfuge, forges her husband's name to a prescription for cocaine and hurries to a drug store. On presenting the prescription the cocaine is given her and she leaves the store. Later she is found in an alley, apparently intoxicated, and is taken to the police station. Dr. Harris is notified and calls for her.

The unfortunate woman is next removed to a sanitarium, locked in a padded cell and left alone to pay the penalty of a moment's curiosity. After three days of horrible suffering the drug releases its deadly hold upon her and she is on the road to health. A month later the curse of cocaine is lifted and she is restored to her husband, a wiser and more prudent woman.

This is perhaps one of the strongest stories of its kind ever portrayed in motion pictures. The artistic handling of the story by clever actors, the splendid settings and scenic work, and the superior photography, make this latest Essanay release one of high art value. Length, 988 feet.

THE DUKE'S JESTER; Or, A FOOL'S REVENGE.—Antonio Bordega, a deformed notary and his wife and baby are living happily together. Malatesta, a dissolute young noble, falls in love with Antonio's wife and carries her off to his palace. She stabs herself. They carry the body out into the street and leave it there. Antonio finds her. As she is dying she tells him that it was Malatesta who carried her off. Antonio swears revenge and taking his baby leaves the town.

Fifteen Years Later.—Antonio has become the Duke's Jester. In this disguise he is watching Malatesta who has married a very young wife. The Jester urges the Duke to carry off Malatesta's wife for his own secret revenge, but one of the Duke's followers has seen the Jester's daughter and comes to the Duke and tells him of her beauty. The Duke and his follower watch the meeting between the Jester and his daughter and the Duke falls in love with her and determines to carry her off. The poet, Dell Aquilla, overhears this and determines to save the Jester's daughter. He carries her to the house of Malatesta for safety, unknown to the Jester. The Duke and his followers with masks and cloaks and a ladder start to carry off the Jester's daughter from the house of Malatesta. The Jester, not knowing, and believing the one that they are going to carry off is Malatesta's wife, gloats over his revenge. The Jester's daughter, wrapped up in a hugh cloak, is carried away and placed in an underground hall of the Duke's palace. The Duke proposes to have a banquet for the fair lady.

The Jester brings the Duke's wife to listen at the door so that she see the Duke is false to her. The Duchess, in a jealous rage, listens, hears a woman's voice and poisons the wine that is being taken into the banquet. When Malatesta appears, the Jester scoffs at him, tells him that his wife is inside with the Duke. Malatesta strikes him and says, "My wife is here." The Duchess tells the Jester that Malatesta lies—"Let him bring his wife here." Malatesta brings in his young wife. The Duchess starts, the Jester is appalled. They laugh him to scorn and leave. The Jester then tries to find out who it is that is in the room with the Duke. Dell Aquilla, the poet, hastily comes in, tells the Jester he has been searching for him to tell him that he has saved his daughter; that he carried her to the house of Malatesta where she slept in safety that night. The Jester realizes the frightful mistake; that it is his own daughter they carried off; that the wine has been poisoned and she is in that room with the Duke,—possibly dead. They force the doors and come into the banquet hall. The duke lies poisoned—dead; the Jester's daughter is in a faint. They ask, "Who poisoned the wine?" The Jester says, "'Twas I." The nobles run their swords through him and he falls at the feet of his daughter who recovers and tells him of her safety, and she is placed in the arms of her lover, Dell Aquilla.

Malatesta comes on, the dying Jester tells Malatesta that 15 years before he stole his wife and in revenge he tried to make the Duke steal Malatesta's wife. He has usurped Heaven's vengeance and only had a Fool's revenge, which recoiled on his own head, and he dies.

THE TROUBLES OF AN AMATEUR DETECTIVE.—A long, lean, lanky individual of the rural type comes down the steps of a police station holding his coat wide open displaying an immense star, a detective, "be-gosh." He is ever on the alert for lawbreakers or disturbers of the peace and at night we see him watching a man who has been detained at his office until very late, making vain attempts to insert his key into the door. The officer grabs for him from behind, the man turns and kicks him into the street just as the wife opens the door and helps her tired husband inside.

He spies a child playing in front of a house as a man passes, gives her a stick of candy and leads her down the street. He is sure this is a kidnapping affair so endeavors to rescue the girl, but in doing so gets a good beating. Passing a grocery store our detective sees a woman picking articles from the different baskets and immediately places her under arrest, thinking her a sneak thief. She gives him a good slap, pays the groceryman for the articles and walks away very indignant. Further down the street a man on a stepladder with a kit of tools is just prying up a window. Our sleuth comes along, pulls the ladder down, the man wallops him good and hard then proceeds to repair the sash. A prospective customer is looking over a suit of clothes displayed on a dummy, the detective observes it, thinks it a holdup, gets in another mixup and is beaten again. Again he finds a woman brushing her husband's trousers and when she pulls out a roll of bills from the pocket he starts to make another arrest. He starts with the woman for the police station but before he has gone far, she is rescued by friends who chase the detective until he runs to the station house for protection. All hands tell their troubles, the detective is set upon by the mob and this time is almost beaten to a finish. Length, 420 feet.

THE OLD ORGAN.—The story opens in the simple but comfortably furnished parlor of a country home. The old mother is playing at the organ, her son John and his young wife are sitting on the sofa chatting, while their little daughter of five years is playing with her doll on the floor. Presently John gets up and with his wife starts on a fishing trip. He sits in the boat smoking his pipe while his wife is absorbed in fishing. A sudden tug at the line excites his wife and anticipating a good prize, she jumps up and the boat capsizes. John grabs his wife, shouts for help and finally gets her out of the water. She is taken home, a doctor summoned but too late to save her life. John is heartbroken over his bereavement, sees an advertisement in the newspaper calling for men to go to the gold fields. Leaving his little girl with his mother he starts for the West. Fortune smiles upon him, he strikes ore, but while prospecting with fellow miners he is accidentally blinded by a charge of dynamite. Berift of his eyesight, John determines to return East. We find him wandering through the country led by a dog, begging from door to door and meeting with but little success. Years pass by and in trudging along a country road the blind man hears sounds of an organ. He immediately recognizes the tune as one his mother used to play in bygone days. He is so overcome that he drops to his knees in supplication. At this moment a little girl appears at the window, sees the blind man, runs outside, helps him to his feet and leads him into the house. The old mother is still playing and as she turns to look at the stranger, she immediately recognizes in him her son John. A joyful reunion takes place and the unfortunate man is happy with his mother and little child. Length, 527 feet.

COWBOY'S ROMANCE.—A settler, accompanied by his wife and little girl, who are making their way through the wild Western country in search of a spot in which to build their home, are attacked by marauding Indians. After a brave fight the father and mother are killed and their wagon burned. Fortunately the child had been sent with a bucket for water, and so escaped death.

The Indians are frightened away by a trio of cowboys who have been attracted to the spot by the shooting. Big Jim and his two companions find the child weeping over the bodies of her dead parents and Jim, moved by the pitiful situation of the little orphan, declares that he will take care of her.

Fifteen years pass, and Nell has grown up into a beautiful woman, courted by many, admired by all. Jim is about to go on a journey, and he writes a letter to Nell telling her that folks think she ought to be married. Will she marry him? He enters to find Nell embraced and being kissed by Dick, the favored suitor. He tears the letter. Nell, turning quickly, sees him. Jim places the torn letter into the pocket of his old coat. The noble-hearted fellow conceals his great disappointment and blesses the young couple.

While Jim is away a strange woman denounces Dick as the husband who had deserted her.

A month later we find Nell sewing up a tear in Jim's old coat. Jim's letter to her, written months before, falls upon the floor. Nell reads it. Jim enters, and Nell answers his proposal with a loving embrace and kiss.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

A CARD

As a result of the wide popularity of our Perfection Song Slides we find ourselves embarassed at not being able to satisfy the extraordinary demand and request the indulgence of our many patrons for a short time until our extensive plant can again be enlarged to meet the requirements.

We also wish to take this opportunity to thank them for their liberal support.

The kind that every Motion Picture patron wants to see and the kind you can depend upon to fill your house. By all means get them. You ought to have them. Fact is you must have them if you want to do your share of the business. Everyone of these films is unsurpassed photographically and subjects similiar in detail have never before been shown. Here is a brief synopsis of

SHIPMENTS JUNE 16th and 17th

THE BRAVE GIRL ON THE FIFTEENTH FLOOR

Phoenix No. 100 Sensational Approx. length 875 ft.

Photographically this film is unsurpassed. It thrills with interest from beginning to end and every detail is beautifully portrayed. It is the kind of film that depicts one of the daily occurrences we read about. The story of a brave stenographer, the employee of a wealthy broker, who repulses the attention of the dishonest bookkeeper, but encourages those of the son. The father discovers the two are in love and denounces his son for taking up with a working girl. They finally become reconciled with the heretofore irate parent, which was brought about

IT TAKES GASOLINE TO WIN A GIRL

Phoenix No. 101 Comedy Approx. length 875 ft.

This film is full of humor from beginning to end. It tells the story of the troubles of two rivals who try to win the favor of a coquettish maiden. The rivals are continually playing tricks upon each other, finally procuring the service of a typical "Weary Willie." This is beautifully portrayed to the last scenes of the film.

the finest of the world's products—to bother with you. Can't be annoyed. He further says that the Independents are "making good" with Trust film secured before going Independent. What a joke. We only use their film for our very cheapest service, and if you can use them and will write us, we will rent you Six reels a week for $20.00, and allow you to sub-rent to one other exhibitor and allow you to earn whatever you can get; also will allow you one-half of rentals on all extra customers you get in addition to the first one. Isn't that getting money pretty easy. This offer is only good from our Chicago office.

Do you notice our price offerings on supplies and accessories. And remember we handle only the best quality of supplies.

WE HANDLE ALL MAKES OF MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

See the back page in this issue guaranteeing protection to exhibitors using Independent film. The International Producing & Projecting Co. also add their tremendous weight of legal talent to the disposal of exchanges and exhibitors using their films. Exhibitor—stand pat—pay no attention to any so-called precedents of suits gained by the Trust. I will show you before long where they have in all cases manufactured a "Dummy" film plant or theatre—brought suit and got confession of judgment from them by crooked use of the courts.

Mr. Exhibitor:

You will receive a letter directed to you by a firm of New York lawyers representing the Motion Picture Patents Co., commonly known as the Trust, suggesting that you are liable to become a party to an infringement Action and Injunction Proceedings.

Our inference is that they are in desperation endeavoring to force you into patronizing the so-called Film Trust and fearing that any of the exhibitors using Independent film or prospective users of Independent film are liable to be intimidated by such tactics, we have organized a NATIONAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION and have retained the services of the best legal talent available. The object of this Association is not only to defend and to protect all of its members, but likewise extend its good offices and legal services without charge to any user of Independent film patronizing its members.

We are confident that a concerted action at this time will call this latest bluff of the so-called Film Trust and put a stop to its harassing methods. We will not only be able to protect the interests of members and exhibitors using Independent film, but we invite definite action against us or any of our members by the Trust. This is to be a National body and we invite the legitimate Independent Film Exchanges to become members. A call for a National Convention will be issued in the near future.

Whether you decide to become a member or to act independently of it, our Secretary will, at all times, be pleased to furnish exchanges and moving picture exhibitors with any information they may desire in connection with this movement.

We request the Independent Exhibitors who may be annoyed in any manner by the Trust representatives to get in connection immediately with our Temporary Secretary providing him with full details.

I have been notified by the film trust that I can have any or all of its new subjects that I might want, in spite of the fact that I am the biggest customer of the International Projecting & Producing Company. Did you ever hear anything to beat that? Did you ever expect such positive proof that the trust cannot stop the International people—and knows that it can't? This astonishing offer came direct from men who, to my absolute knowledge, are employed by film trust manufacturers. Of course they swear by all that's good that they are acting independently of the trust, but that's as transparent as glass. If they think it is dishonorable in me to publish what they told me "in strict confidence," let them remember that I gave public warning to everybody that I would expose the innermost insides of the film situation every time I got hold of facts worth publishing. My whole purpose is to rip things wide open, let the exhibitors know precisely what is going on and trust to them for my patronage. I don't want any exhibitor to hesitate about using my films for fear of disastrous consequences. I want him to know exactly what's what! And if anyone doesn't like my methods of exposure, he knows what he can do.

THE WAY OF MAN

This subject certainly upsets the old maxim, "Beauty is only skin deep," for it clearly shows that appearances are everything. No matter what our virtues and accomplishments are, if we are homely we are simply out of the game. This is especially true with a woman, for an ugly woman, sad to say, is an aversion. Tom Herne is engaged to Mabel Jarrett, and goes West to fight for fortune to be the more worthy of her. During his absence an accident befalls Mabel—a lamp exploding, disfiguring her face for life. The sight of the poor girl is a great shock to Tom, and although he makes an effort to dissemble, Mabel realizes his feeling and, pretending to commit suicide, buries herself in a charitable institution, caring for homeless foundlings. The self-sacrifice is made that Tom may marry Winnie, her pretty cousin.

Length, 986 Feet.

THE NECKLACE

A Powerful Story of the Reward of Vanity.

Vanity, the foundation of the most ridiculous and contemptible vices, is often the cause of woe and disaster, and this subject proves the conclusiveness of the assertion. A young married woman, yearning for ostentation, is invited with her husband to a reception at which several of the nobility are to be present. In moderate circumstances, she feels she hasn't the raiment befitting the occasion, so her husband pawns his watch and chain to procure her a gown; also further humiliating himself to borrow a necklace to adorn her shoulders. During the ball the jewels are stolen, and they price a substitute to replace it. Twenty thousand dollars is the figure marked on the apparent duplicate. To raise this they mortgage their very lives, borrowing money on notes. Meanwhile the thief has tried to dispose of the necklace and finds it a worthless imitation. Five, ten, fifteen years later we find them toiling, toiling, but still in bondage. Their hair white, their bodies bent, their strength ebbing. Twenty years and the necklace is paid for, but at the expense of their lives, only to find out that the one they lost was paste and worthless.

SAVED FROM THE FLAMES

Spectacular Drama. Approximate Length, 453 Feet.

An elderly lady has as her boon companion a pet dog. The visit of a grandson causes the woman to lavish her attentions upon him and neglect the dog. This causes the dog to seek vengeance upon the boy and he enters the bed-room of the latter, where he upsets a lighted lamp and causes a fire. When the mistress returns and finds the house afire she is greatly excited and worried lest the boy suffer harm. The dog goes to the rescue of the lad in the nick of time. This puts him in favor and he is fairly idolized for his brave act.

NO APPETITE FOR DINNER

Comedy. Approximate Length, 430 Feet.

A civilian had invited his friend, an army officer, to dine with him on a certain day.

On the date set the officer has just concluded dinner in his own apartments and is glancing over the paper when, from the date thereof, it occurs to him that he has forgotten about his engagement. At the home of the prospective host the appointment had also been overlooked and, as the officer is announced, the family are about ready to leave the table. A second meal is prepared and both make every effort to relish the food, but as a matter of fact both feel satisfied after the first meal. Finally a mutual confession is given and all join in the hearty laughter.

The acting of this story is very good and will meet with universal approval.

THE HAND BELL

RELEASE, SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1909.

Comedy. Approximate Length, 420 Feet.

A highly amusing subject. A fairy story of modern type. An old lady is seen begging by the wayside and the kindly disposed gentleman gives her a coin, but she proves to be a fairy, the last surviving member of the legend, "Thousand and One Nights," and rewards his kindness by presenting him a handbell that simulates very mysterious qualities. With it he can surmount any nature of difficulty; silencing the janitor, secures attention at the post-office and insures protection from attack, but he is unable to appease the anger of his wife's mother, and, discouraged, he discards the talisman for which his subdued antagonists now attack him the more vigorously.

THE SUNNY SOUTH OF FRANCE

Travelogue. Approximate Length, 535 Feet.

A delightfully pleasing series of views covering the most beautiful and romantic sections of Southern France.

THE PHANTOM SIRENS

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY JUNE 30, 1909.

Drama. Approximate Length, 727 Feet.

TINTED, NO EXTRA COST.

A pretty picture-story of the fabled sea-nymphs. Grand marine effects. Fishermen depart for the fisheries. En route they are attracted by the Sirens, who invite them on to the rocks, but the alluring women vanish each time they are on the point of being overtaken. The men return home disconsolate, neglect their sweethearts, think of nothing but the Sirens, and go back to Hypso. The female folk invoke the aid of the Statue of the Virgin and proceed to the Isle, where they present the Holy Cross to the Mermaids, who thereupon magically disappear in the sea. The girls take their places and the spell is broken—the sailors, on approaching, recognizing in the supposed Sirens their own lasses.

RULERS OF THE WORLD

Novelty. Approximate Length, 265 Feet.

TINTED.

A decidedly novel method of presenting a number of the foremost rulers of the world.

The nations represented are England, Germany, Russia, France, Spain and United States.

SURE TO PROVE A HIT.

Some More Food for Thought

"Never prophesy unless you know," is a piece of advice we commend to some partisan scribes with whom the wish is the father to thought. For it is dangerous to prophesy—unless you know.

There are many "movements" in the moving picture field. Some are successful, some are in process of achieving success, whilst, with others, success, we are convinced, is only a matter of experience. We have felt it our duty recently to be severe on several of these movements and their manifestations. For example: We have more than once deprecated the marketing of junk by film exchanges. Well, the film exchange and the exhibitors have taken heed of our remarks and junk is disappearing. This is some more food for thought.

And here is more: We have also felt it our duty to deprecate the production of pictures in which peaceful Eastern surroundings by both licensed and unlicensed manufacturers are shown in Wild West subjects. Well, both licensed and unlicensed manufacturers have personally assured us that our strictures are thoroughly well justified and they have promised us they will not do these things again. And they are not doing them—which is also some more food for thought.

And then we told the newest manufacturers why the exchanges are not buying their pictures in sufficiently large quantities. And the Independent manufacturer, to the credit of his intelligence, has recognized and admitted the truth of what we say and he is going about the business of making moving pictures in the best possible and the only possible way: He is employing high-class talent to write the stories, to produce the pictures and to photograph them, and he is truning out work which is far and away ahead in quality of that which he produced three months ago, when we commenced first of all to tell him how to make moving pictures and also how not to make them. In other words, he has got wise to the game, as wise as some of those persons who are said to be the only producers of the "highest class," "moral, educational and cleanly amusing," "the most perfect," etc., etc., etc. The growing manufacturing movement, so far from collapsing, appears to be very full of vitality, indeed. Which is still more food for thought for those who seem to stand in somewhat urgent necessity of something to think about and write about.

It is the duty of the Moving Picture World, as the representative organ of the trade, to encourage all enterprises within its field that are conducted along legitimate lines. The boosters for factional elements can be excused for their mud-slinging and the knocks handed out to each other's backers. It is their only mission. As long as a new manufacturer is not interfered with it may be inferred that he is acting within his legal rights; which is some more food for thought to the self-appointed champion of other interests, and whose sphere of influence may be indicated by o. If, in the opinion of the Moving Picture World, the work produced by any manufacturer is of such quality as is calculated to elevate and promote the moving picture business, it is our duty, as well as that of our critic, to encourage, such effort.

Current Saving Devices

"I love a fair critic, but Oh you knocker," to paraphrase a popular slang phrase of the day. Our attention has been called to a published diatribe against moving picture machines in general and current saving devices in particular that caps the climax as an expression of egotism and ignorance. The ridiculous statements therein might have been passed as a merry jest if they had not been prefaced by the following false assertions:

> "We wish emphatically to say that there is hardly a current saving device on the market to-day that is any good. We have examined, tested and watched the working of all the various devices that are now on the market, which, in our opinion, are mere catch-pennies. The exhibitors who use these devices simply lose their money and have to throw away the appliances in the end."

Now we venture to say that there are hundreds of our readers who can testify to the absurdity of the first statement, while the text of the whole article shows that the writer thereof was not qualified to judge, even if he had "examined, tested and watched," which assertion is also open to doubt.

Statistics count. "Facts are chiels that winna ding." But facts are never looked for in the paper that published the article in question. A hasty canvass of exhibitors using current saving devices in this vicinity has shown savings which amounted from 40 to 80 per cent. Such great variation in the saving was found to be due to the fact that some of the exhibitors stated the amount of their entire current bill before and after the installation of the saving device. It is plain that the figures could not produce a more uniform showing, as these devices are only installed for the moving picture lamp and do not influence the current bill for the incandescent lamps. After eliminating the latter expense the figures then showed plainly the difference between the cost of running the m. p. arc on a rheostat and on a current saving device. They averaged up fairly well and showed a saving of from 60 to 80 per cent.

Take one example of a show running 150 hours a month and projecting a good picture on the screen 70 feet from the booth. The current bill was $135 running on a rheostat. An equally good picture was obtained by feeding through a current saver at an expense of only from $30 to $45 a month. The price of even the most expensive current saver would therefore be saved in a short time and the exhibitor pocket a nice profit every month thereafter, as the standard current savers are practically indestructible as long as they are used on the circuit for which they are constructed.

In smaller towns or cities where the moving picture machine is in use a lesser number of hours per month, the bill is correspondingly lower. The current bill in a small city or town for moving picture lamp current with rheostat control may average $60 per month. The average bill under the same conditions, using a current saving device, is about $25, so that in cities where the moving picture lamp operates comparatively few hours per month, a saving of $25 to $35 per month is not to be overlooked.

The writer of the article from which we have quoted goes on to say that all current saving devices are "built on the principle of the old Rumkorff coil." Some, perhaps, but not all. Any graduate of an electrical training school can build a choke coil and dozens of appliances, outwardly different but radically the same, have been foisted on the market by different manufacturers since the success of the first practical economizer demonstrated that there was a demand for current saving devices. We could mention a round dozen whose high sounding names are no longer heard and whose purchasers have replaced them with scientifically built apparatus.

We referred to standard current saving devices, and, while it is not the province of this article to advertise any apparatus, we feel that our readers should know those which have given eminent satisfaction to the experts with whom we have consulted. While we may have overlooked some, the N. Power Co.'s "Inductor," the General Electric "Mercury Arc Rectifier," the Hallberg "Economizer," the Fort Wayne Electric Works "Compensarc" and the Electric Appliance Co.'s "Regulator" were mentioned. Our own correspondence files also bear testimony to the efficiency of some of these devices, any or all of which we do not hesitate to say do all that is claimed for them if intelligently used.

Much has been written and said in regard to the utility of current saving devices for alternating current. Most of the opinions, pro and con, have emanated from interested sources, therefore could have little weight, even if they were presentations of fact. The scientific principles of all parts that go to make up a moving picture outfit are so varied that only a man of the very highest technical training could hope to master them all. The exhibitor, however, is in business for the net earnings of his show and is interested in the details of his apparatus to an extent only which will permit him to handle his equipment intelligently and as profitably as possible.

Current saving devices have been proved to be a highly profitable investment. Large concerns that have built up an enviable reputation on other articles are not liable to jeopardize their good name by putting out "catch-penny" devices. To obtain the best results, the exhibitor should give clear information as to the voltage, cycles and other particulars. The current saving device can be had to meet any requirements as to throw and size of picture, which factors govern the required intensity of the electric arc. They are made non-adjustable and adjustable, and the latter are operated exactly like adjustable rheostats. They can be used in open air show, in long throws in summer time, and transferred to a closed show of shorter throw by an adjustment as in the case of an adjustable rheostat. They all have stationary parts only and there is no wear and tear on them. Moreover, they are easily installed in accordance with the directions furnished by the maker of the instrument.

Their construction, in general, is identical with that of a transformer, and transformers are known to have a long tenure of usefulness. It would be very interesting for every exhibitor, in whose locality alternating current is furnished, to visit the local electric light plant, and have the electrical engineer show him an ordinary transformer in operation. He could then clearly see how the current is fed into one stationary coil and how, by means of an iron core, it induces the current in the second coil, which flows to the moving picture arc.

It would not do, however, to use an ordinary lighting transformer and work it in conjunction with an arc, because an ordinary transformer has no means of regulating the amount of electric current drawn by the m. p. arc. The genuine current saving devices for moving pictures are designed with that purpose in view. They are transformers which have embodied in their design a strong regulating effect, whereby an even, steady flow of electricity is delivered to the arc.

If, after installing a current saving device, the light is found to be too weak or too strong for your purpose, do not blame the instrument. The manufacturer of the device probably lacked the necessary data as to throw and size of picture, or did not know your exact voltage. It can be re-adjusted to your precise requirements by simply stating the facts to the maker.

We are prepared to put our readers in touch with a number of makers of thoroughly reliable current saving devices on request.

Partisan Error

The partisan and the zealot have always been menaces to progress. They are so blinded by their prejudices that they fail to see that each question has two sides. In olden times two knights once met; a shield was suspended in the air. One knight remarked that the shield was golden and the other knight said that it was silvern. Then they fought, and in their extremity, for they died, each got to the other side of the shield and recognized that one side of it was golden and the other side silvern.

Our advocacy of a National Film Service Association has evoked the biased retort that it is an impossibility because it is an economic fallacy. The fallacy, of course, lies in an untenable assumption. That untenable assumption is that it is possible to conduct an industry without the intervention of a middle man or distributor. Any person with half the intelligence which our critic ought to have, but unfortunately does not possess, who takes a walk through any of the New York streets and looks at the shops or stores, or surveys the down town commercial district, will recognize that facts are against the assumption. It is the case, as we have pointed out before, that the wish is the father to the thought.

Apparently, however, our critic is only partially sincere in his advocacy. If he were entirely so, then what further need is there for the hundred or so exchanges on whose behalf he pleads? He does not seem to realize that if even all those on whose behalf he does violence to his reasoning powers, went out of business to-morrow, the moving picture business as such would still go on.

And that is our point. We have the moving picture business as a whole, and its interests, at heart—not any section of it; consequently our commentator's forced arguments fall to the ground. We are more interested in the matter than he is, because we are disinterested, and he is not. We stand for, as he properly recognizes, better films and better prices, and in our philosophy the latter part of the matter can be just as well handled by the distributor as by the producer, or, at any rate, by both in agreement. It is so in other industries throughout the world, so why not in the moving picture business, which, after all, is of mushroom growth and therefore stands urgently in need of disinterested regulation?

The partisan platitudes evoked by our articles on the new F. S. A. supply no noticeable reason why we should depart from the attitude on this matter which we took up on January 9th, last, before the moving picture field was enriched by the presence of a writer who has derived so much information and benefit from these pages. "The renter is an indispensable factor in most branches of trade, and certainly so in the moving picture industry." [Page 29, January 9th.] But whether the renter himself is fully alive to the value and importance of his position in the matter is entirely for his own decision. If he chooses to allow himself to be dispensed with, well and good. But if so the business as a whole is bound, as any common-sense person with more than a newspaper acquaintance with the conditions of modern commerce ought to know, to suffer in more ways than one.

A National Board of Censorship.

SECOND ARTICLE.

Supplementary to our first article of last week we have been at considerable pains to ascertain the steps that have been made, and are being made, in order to establish a National Board of Censorship on lines that will be satisfactory to all interested in the welfare of the moving picture industry. We desire to acknowledge the courteous co-operation of Mr. John Collier in enabling us to present the following facts to our readers, which also embody the official views of the censorship authorities on the subject.

The problem of financial support for the censorship has been solved by the People's Institute, which has undertaken the sponsorship for the work on the financial side. The People's Institute has espoused the cause of moving pictures, and believes that censorship, considered nationally, is the most important work to be done just now. The People's Institute will invite contributions from every section of the trade—exhibitors and manufacturers alike; but these contributions will go into the general fund of the People's Institute. The censorship is thus given permanent security on the financial side and is made independent of the trade, for the People's Institute is large and well established enough to be free from the charge of graft.

There are other points which will interest our readers. In the first place, all shades of public opinion are represented, and the Censorship Board will be retained in the new arrangements. The governing Board of the Censorship will become the Executive Committee of the People's Institute on moving pictures. This Board is made up of the representative of the Public Schools and the following organizations: The City Vigilance League, the Ethical-Social League, the Federation of Churches, the League for Political Education, the Neighborhood Workers' Association, the People's Institute, the Public Education Association, the Public Schools, the Society for the Prevention of Crime, the Women's Municipal League, Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors of New York State. It will be further enlarged to include the names of individuals known throughout the country.

What about the work which the censorship has to do? The first thing to emphasize is that merely censoring pictures is only a part of that work. The Board will continue to censor all the pictures shown in New York, and will make every effort to nationalize the censorship. At present, the Motion Picture Patents Company are applying the censorship nationally, and the People's Institute is negotiating with the various Independents, and hopes that they will soon agree to submit their pictures nationally. It is clear that the only way by which to protect the public from bad pictures is to make the censorship national, for the simple reason that the supply of pictures is national. At present the whole country seems to be getting busy to establish a local Board of Censorship. Every one of these Boards may be as wise as the New York Board, and they may be wiser, but their standards of censorship are certain to vary from New York's and to vary from each other. How will it be possible for any manufacturer to adapt his product to all these Censorship Boards? The manufacturers do not object to censorship, and there is no reason why they should. They ask nothing better than the Censorship Board, whose methods they can familiarize themselves with, and will thus produce pictures that will go anywhere in the country. But they cannot make their pictures to suit numerous Censorship Boards located all over the country. This without regard to the question of graft or political influence which will creep into the various Boards; so the New York Board, which looks at things from the standpoint of public interest, and the manufacturers, who look at things from their own standpoint, agree on at least one proposition—that there should be one Censorship Board for the whole country.

All the same, there are local conditions in each city that need to be remedied. Here the vaudeville is in a bad way, there the sanitary conditions in shows are bad, etc., etc. We cannot expect that the different cities will lie down on this situation. On the contrary, they insist on remedying them.

We suggest that they co-operate with the New York Board in their censorship of pictures, and act on their own initiative only with regard to local problems. The main value of any Censorship Board is not in the things that are cut out, but the influence it has on the future output of pictures. Moving picture making is an art and a form of the drama with an enormous future along artistic lines. The duty of a Board of Censorship is to guide and stimulate the manufacturers so that the pictures they produce will appeal to the best intelligence of the widest possible public.

In another direction the Censorship Board means to take hold of the local situation. The past two years have proved conclusively that on the present situation of license and the laws governing moving picture shows very little satisfactory work can be done. We cannot regulate the shows, and the shows cannot feel any security.

At present this city is left free to grant or refuse a license practically at will. It may revoke a license when it sees fit and has only to name the cause—not to prove to a court of law that it is right. At this moment there exists one local ordinance regarding moving picture shows—the ordinance restricting the admission of children—which has itself been superseded by a State law. But there are so many regulations of various departments that nobody has ever made a list of them, and this is the trouble. These regulations are not codified or even published. They are subject to change over night; and a license which may involve an investment of $10,000 may be revoked without notice by the license bureau. Think of that situation. A license involves property that may represent all a man has in the world, and through the license this property may be virtually confiscated without notifying the man before hand. Under this condition, responsible men and large capital are certainly not going into the moving picture business. Further than this, the license bureau for the last two years has been subject to sudden whims. It has changed its mind, and with great explosions of virtue such as occurred last December, when the Mayor revoked all licenses at one stroke of the pen. Under conditions like these it cannot be expected that the exhibitor is going to care much about being virtuous, for if he is going to stay alive, it must be by other devices than the devices of righteousness.

Here, again, the Censorship Board and the trade want pretty nearly the same things. The Censorship Board insists that the license shall be regarded as property, that the regulations shall be made public, and shall not be subject to change without notice; that a license shall not be revoked except by due process of law, and that the whole subject shall be taken out of the realm of caprice and favoritism. Whether all this can be accomplished is another question, but the Board of Censorship and the organizations that are members of it will find out. An ordinance will be introduced covering the points above outlined, laying down reasonable but strict regulations governing moving picture shows. An effort will be made to push the issue to the fore in the approaching political campaign and to get results either from the present administration or from the administration soon to be elected. To carry on this twofold work—national censorship and local regulation—two secretaries will be employed. The Censorship Board will keep its present offices at 96 Fifth avenue.

The New York situation with regard to the license is not merely a local situation; to a greater or less extent, the same condition is found in other cities, and to work out the problem in New York will greatly help those who need to work it out in other cities. It is most important that everyone in the trade should recognize that the Censorship Board is at this moment a keystone of the moving picture arch. It represents a community of interest, between the exhibitor, the renter on one hand, and the right hand public on the other. It means co-operation in place of persecution. The public needs entertainment of the best indoor form, and it goes without saying that moving pictures need the public.

Censoring pictures is about the hardest job that could be put out to any man. The Censorship Board have tried to be as liberal as was consistent with public interest, with the result some people think they have been too liberal.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

Chapter XV.

EDUCATIONAL.

Heretofore I have only glanced at the educational possibilities of the moving picture in a casual way. Of course, all moving pictures are "educational," but I mean educational in a sense of which we hold education itself to be of the utmost importance. I allude to primary and secondary education; that is, education in the school for youths and adolescents. The map, the blackboard, the lantern slide, the demonstrator's table have done duty for hundreds of years, but must yield the preference for real effectiveness to the moving pictures. The latter is the only sure way of appealing to the intellect through the eye. Other methods only show one position or phase of an object, or a series of objects, illustrated. With the moving picture, however, you are enabled to show the thing itself, as it is commonly said, like life. If it be an industry, then you show the industry actually in progress; if it be natural history, the animal or bird is shown living its life in a natural way. If it is desired to illustrate the manners and customs of a foreign country, or the growth of plants, or travel; if it be required to demonstrate the physiology of a living object; if it be desired to teach history by showing moving pictures of historical scenes; then the moving picture camera will be found to do all this far more effectively than it can be done by stationary photographic or other graphic representation. Indeed, in this respect the moving picture camera is a perfect substitute for the real thing itself, whatever that real thing may be.

All the tendency of the times is to educate objectively: that is to say, to get away as far as possible from mere pedantry and book knowledge and to appeal to the brain and the intellect by direct means, that is, by showing the pupil the very thing itself about which it is desired he should learn the uses and objects. But, of course, in a great many cases this is impracticable; much as you would like to actually show your pupil how life is lived in New Mexico, for example, it is impracticable because you cannot bring a bit of New Mexico into your school together with a sufficient number of New Mexicans. But you can do just as well. You can photograph a bit of New Mexico and some Mexicans in your moving picture camera. You can show the results on the screen, you can talk round them, and your pupils will thus learn more than they would by reading dry and pedagogic books.

Now the suggestion here thrown out is one capable of widespread application. In short, it is up to the educational authorities all over the United States to recognize the enormous value of the moving picture in primary and secondary educational matters. I think that it should form a part of the outfit of every public school, but it should also be used in the high school, the college and the university. I know that in the latter classes it is used for specialistic purposes, but then it is not every pupil who goes either to a high school, a college, or a university. What I plead for is the use of the moving picture in the beginning of things, and that is in the public school. If this were done, I am convinced that great beneficial results in an educational way would be gained and, moreover, the moving picture industry would be advantaged because a great amount of work of a Slowly but surely the moving picture for educational purposes is driving the lantern slide from the field. The latter for amusement and entertaining purposes still is and always will be very popular, but when we get down to the utilitarian aspect of things, it is obvious that motion will always be preferable to immobility. It is a case again of Pygmalion and Galatea. In this beautiful romance Pygmalion completes the statue of a lovely woman. He was so enraptured with his hand work that he wished the statue to come to life, and so the statue did. Few of us who saw the beautiful American actress, Mary Anderson, play Galatea will ever forget the experience. The moving picture is a kind of photographic Galatea that has come to life, but, unlike Galatea, who went back to her marble-like condition, after slightly disarranging things in the sculptor's household, the moving picture will go on living. And sooner or later it will take a permanent place in every schoolroom.

In closing this series of short chapters on the making of moving pictures I desire to state that I have material in hand for a second and even more advanced series, which will commence in an early number of the next volume of The Moving Picture World.

On account of pressure on our space the regular chapters of Mr. Richardson's and Mr. Sackheim's articles are held over until next number.

"I love my automobile, but, oh, you motor boat!" It is due more to good luck than good guidance that the moving picture trade, is not minus one of the leading lights in the producing field, and crepe hanging over the eagle trademark.

The exchange men, who gather together at Atlantic City next month, do not expect that anything of great importance will develop at the meeting. Herbert Miles, the secretary, has sent notices to all members, asking them to put in writing any business that they desire to bring up and send to him in advance. This is an excellent idea, as it will reduce the time that is usually wasted at such meetings if the points to be discussed are presented in concrete form.

ON THE SCREEN.

By "Lux Graphicus."

"When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?" Not much dignity in the Garden of Eden, as anybody can realize who thinks out the situation for himself. Dignity, as Carlyle says, only belongs to the man who works, and as all work is dignified, why then we arrive at a real basis of equality. Everybody is dignified who works, and he who does not work has no right to be considered dignified. So now we know what dignity is.

I see that a writer in a theatrical paper is discussing the question whether an actor sacrifices his dignity in doing moving picture work. Actors, or some of them, are very "dignified" persons. They talk and write very largely about their art and the mission of the stage. I don't think any of them are sincere in all this. It is just so much dust thrown in the eyes of an ignorant public. A public which, by the way, in its own ignorance, makes far too much fuss over the successful actor or actress.

I know, and have known, some very prominent actors. Here, in this city, I have met quite a few of them in their dressing rooms when the usual whiskey and sodas and "How do you do?" were proffered. They are the princes of good fellows, these actors. They don't talk much of "dignity." It is with them simply a question of "How much per," plus, of course, an honest endeavor to do their work to the satisfaction of their employer —that is, the public. Of course, if a lot of empty-headed women pander and toady to them, it is hardly to be expected that, human nature being what it is, these same actor men should not give the dear but foolish creatures what they ask for.

I have heard Irving, Wyndham, Tree, Hare, Toole, Mansfield and other noted actors talk largely in public about dignity, art and all the rest of the stock in trade of the insincere orator. For these people are insincere in regard to their public utterances. Privately they look upon themselves as just what they are—tradesmen, workers or what you will, who offer their goods to the public for sale at "so much per."

* * *

An actor may conceivably lose caste by mumming before the moving picture camera, but he can hardly lose dignity. Caste is one thing, dignity is another. Caste is an artificial state of existence, due to the fact that Society resolves itself into a series of sets of people which do not intermingle. I am a very casty person myself, for example. I would not, if I could help it, be found dead in a ditch with the 400 or some other sets of New York city. As to a question of dignity, we are possibly on terms of equality. They work in their way and I work in mine. That is all there is to it. They don't admit me to their set, and I strongly object to their presence in mine. That is a question of caste.

So it may be with the actor or actress, if it is known that they do moving picture work, although I should doubt if the matter ever reacts unfavorably on them. One thing is quite clear and bears reiteration; they would not lose dignity, for they would be working, which is the very best thing that either man or woman can be doing. There is another aspect of the matter which calls for notice, and it is this, that moving picture dramatic work is a great leveler in so far as the public is concerned. It is not the question of a star character with all the others in the piece revolving around it at a respectable distance. Oh, no! On the silent stage all are on an equality so far as the public is concerned, although their opportunities may be unequal. The moving picture theater is therefore a great democratizer.

I hope no Broadway actor or actress has really felt that his or her dignity was imperiled by working in a moving picture theatre. I don't think he or she has. I think, I believe—nay, I actually know, that many of them, poor devils, have only been too glad to get hold of a welcome dollar or two, which they would not have got if they stood severely on their "dignity"—that is, remained out of work. So enough about "dignity," friend.

The Baby Show as a Summer Attraction

The baby show scheme, which was first inaugurated by the Brayton Slide Manufacturing Co., of Chicago, has proved so successful as a money-getter for the showman that it is likely to be the fad of the summer among the little theatres. Slide makers in other sections of the country have taken up the idea and several exhibitors have written to us for information as to how to work the scheme. The prize should be a substantial one, and it may be obtained from some local dealer who will be glad to donate it for the advertising he receives. One manager got a go-cart for the first prize from a furniture dealer and a jeweler donated the second prize. In return for this the exhibitor displays a slide showing a photograph of the prize, who gave it, and stating where it can be seen. As this gives the merchant advertising on the theater screen for a month, it is well worth to him the cost of even a very superior article. The Brayton Slide Mfg. Co. furnishes free information to any exhibitor, but the following particulars which were given by their manager to our Chicago representative may be of interest to our readers:

The first thing in importance in arranging for a Baby Show is the grand prize to be offered to the successful contestant. Any merchant in your town will be only too glad to supply the prize. It may be a baby carriage, a gold watch, a sewing machine, any article of furniture, or dishes; in fact, anything which appeals to a mother's heart. The merchant will be glad to do this for advertising on your screen.

The next in importance is a place to display this grand prize. If of convenient size, your box office is the place. If not, have it placed in the merchant's window.

The next, and one of the most important moves, is publicity. In our experience the most successful way to give wide publicity to a coming contest is as follows: Place over your entrance or upon your bulletin board as large and as conspicuous bulletins or banners as possible, such announcement as seems best to you. At the same time commence throwing the following slides upon your screen, which, we find, after having tried many schemes, to be the best and most effective means for starting the contest:

"The Baby Show Contest will commence here June 20th. See the Grand Prize for the handsomest Baby, displayed in our Box Office."

Immediately following this slide throw upon the screen a picture of a baby, upon which is the following: "Chicago's Prize Winner. Can you beat it?" These two slides we furnish at the following prices: The first one $1.00, the second one, the baby, 50c. plain, 75c. colored. These two slides should be thrown upon the screen at every entertainment during the entire time of announcement, which should not be less than a week or ten days prior to the commencement of the contest.

Now you see what is really needed to conduct this contest successfully is the grand prize, the two slides, with other publicity available, such as your bulletins and advertisements in your local newspapers and coupon tickets, which you can procure from us or from any film exchange.

All the people in your community, of course, are not patrons of your show. You should try to reach every one in your town, and we think the newspaper is the best medium outside of the methods named above for reaching all of the people. If you can afford it a band or some other attraction on the street is good, because noise is always attractive.

You are aware that theater-goers are thirsting for novelty and variety. They go to your place of amusement for amusement, of course, but they want it ever changing—something new—therefore the Baby Show will be a very great attraction. The scenes in the streets will surprise you and be very amusing, and of itself will attract large crowds; and you know crowds generate enthusiasm, and enthusiasm for any cause loosens the purse strings.

Very soon after you have made your announcements you will be called upon to explain how the contest is conducted. It will be necessary for you to either announce from the stage or get printed matter to instruct the people as to how to enter the contest. This, of course, is very simple and should be conducted in your own language about as follows:

"Did you see the baby picture on the screen? Bring us a photograph of your baby and we will have a slide made similar to that, which we will give you when the contest is over. Each of these baby pictures will be numbered, so that it can be seen plainly when thrown upon the screen. At the ticket office as the people pass in coupon tickets will be sold like this"—showing your inquirer the coupon ticket—saying, "This part of the ticket will admit you, and on the other you mark the number of the baby for whom you wish to vote; the people in the audience making their choice and marking the number on the ticket and voting as they pass out."

After having induced the party to enter the contest and after having received the money for the slide say to her: "Now you must remember that the winners in baby contests are the ones who get the greatest number of votes, and not always the handsomest baby, and the great interest and enthusiasm which always attend a baby show are because of the friends of the contestants working among others, creating enthusiasm, inducing them to attend the contest and vote as many tickets as they feel like buying for the favorite baby." There arises a spirit of rivalry which seems to have no bounds at times. This is about all that is needed to get parties to enter the contest.

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE FOUNDLING (Vitagraph).

The story of "The Foundling" is one of the best of a week of good productions in which all manufacturers have scored above their average. Not even in its high art films, in which the Vitagraph Company displays its talent for elaborate staging, has it ever produced a subject which so gripped the attention of moving picture theatregoers. As we watched the effect that this film produced on a crowded house, we could not help feeling that the silent drama had come into its own as a substantial and permanent means of entertainment.

The film starts with a touching scene which shows the death of a man who is about to marry the woman he has wronged. Left alone with her child, she seeks the aid of her father, who roughly turns her adrift. Tramping the streets, she sees a stage door open, bringing into contrast the light and warmth inside with the swirling snow and cold that is threatening the life of her child. She cautiously enters and abandons the infant in the dressing-room of the leading actor, who adopts the child, and it grows up to regard him as its father. Ten years after, the mother, who has also achieved success on the stage, becomes the leading lady in the same company with the actor, who falls in love with her, but she refuses his offer of marriage on account of her past. The child visits her father at the theater and explanations follow and a confession from the mother. The actor renews his appeal, which is seconded by the little girl, who has now both father and mother, and a happy marriage results.

Briefly this is the story, and it has been interpreted by capable actors whose faces are new in Vitagraph films. Without exception their parts were well performed, and the scenes are so well arranged and so convincing that the film, as a whole, stands out as being so far above the average that the Vitagraph folks will have to work hard to excel it or even to keep up to its standard.

LOVE WINS (Centaur),

The Centaur Company has taken a bold step in entering the comedy section of the moving picture field—a step which we think, after seeing their latest picture, "Love Wins," will be perfectly well justified. For at all points of the game, this film is a marked improvement on the work which the company has so far turned out. That improvement has, of course, come with experience. It is gratifying to us to find that the company possess the necessary intelligence to profit by their experience, as they are obviously doing. It is not every maker of moving picture films that does, or can do, this. We feel that the Centaur Company have definitely got on the right track of the work, and we also feel that a successful career is before them.

For in "Love Wins" we perceive the practised hand of the skilful dramatist. At every turn we recognize the craftsman, the man who knows how to write a moving picture story, and also knows how to rehearse and produce it. There is not a crude moment, not a moment of hesitation in this pretty little story, which we think will be popular with moving picture audiences wherever it is shown. The dramatist does not overload his canvas at the start. There is a lover and his lass, of course. The land upon which the girl is living suddenly acquires great value, because silver is found here. The old people are almost persuaded to part with the land for a mere song, when the lover opportuntely intervenes and saves the situation. The sudden enrichment of the old people decides the ambitious mother to marry the girl to a wealthy suitor. The scheme, when they get in their new and "toney" surroundings, promises well, for the old lover is made, by means of a forged letter, to appear faithless, so the girl gives her hand to number two. But there is many a slip twixt the cup and the lip. On her wedding morn the girl takes it into her head to cry off her bargain, for she still loves number one, and is not convinced of his faithlessness. In this she is justified, for he turns up, disavows the forgery and so secures his true love. Or almost. The ambitious mother, not to be foiled, still interferes, but she is finally squelched, and the happy pair are united by a convenient clergyman. Now, here the Centaur Company are carrying out the Moving Picture World formula of a simple story well told—a story which the average moving picture audience can understand and like. And we certainly think they will like this one. It is extremely well acted. The characters are natural in their gestures and movements, although here and there the transition from one movement to another is somewhat rapid, but then that is inevitable in a moving picture. Moreover, the picture has been extremely well photographed. "Love Wins" produces a very pleasing impression on our minds, and we think the Centaur Company will be successful in the new and agreeable vein of picture making which they have struck.

THE LOST INVITATION (Edison).

The Edison Company does not often break out into pure comedy, and when it does its work is worth watching, for all around it is showing marked improvements, and whatever comes now, however good it is, is, we are persuaded, as we said a few weeks ago, only symptomatic of much better to come. For the Edison resources are so vast that it can only be a question of time for it to definitely place itself in such a commanding position that it need fear no competition on the score of merit. In "The Lost Invitation" the producers have handled a clever idea in a splendid manner. A lady is given a fancy dress ball, and she invites a friend of hers, who, in accepting, says that he will come as tramp. So he does. But the lordly lackeys refuse to admit him into the house because he has lost his invitation. Meanwhile, a real tramp has picked up that invitation and, daringly resolving to have a good time, he bravely presents the card to the lackeys, who admit him to the house. The impostor certainly enjoys himself. He might have got through unnoticed had not the real guest been fortunate enough to overcome his difficulties and gain admission into the house in propria persona, whereupon he unmasks the intruding tramp, who is, of course, promptly ejected from the presence of the gaily-dressed masqueraders. Finally we see a picture of the hobo, who is assuring himself and us that he does not propose to keep up his society experiments.

This picture causes great hilarity, but it does not, in the language of the critic, play "closely enough." Occasionally, too, the characters walk and dance at funereal rates. Then, again, the photographer at one part of the picture allows a head to intrude which should not have been there. These, however, are minor blemishes which we feel this particular company can obviate on future occasions. In the course of the piece nothing more effective was seen than the incident where the tramp guest was arrested by a policeman for not paying his cab fare. When he was presented in court to the magistrate, the removal of his wig showed him to be a real judge to the astonishment of all. So, of course, he was promptly released. All through the pictures there are many ingenious touches like these, showing that the Edison Company has command of very high-class producing ability.

Now we come to the photographic end. There is a distinct improvement week by week in this, although there is room for the elimination of many minor technical defects, such as light and dark spots, irregular patches and the like, which are probably due to lack of necessary attention to details in the positive end of the work. The toning and tinting of the picture are excellent, and, on the whole, we have pleasure in according this film very high praise indeed.

A GOOD-HEARTED POLICEMAN. (Gaumont).

The policeman is the butt of civilization. Here in New York city he is feared and not liked, and everybody jokes at him. In London they joke at him, but they respect him; in Paris they don't joke at him, but everybody respects him. Generally speaking, however, the policeman is regarded as the unemotional embodiment of law and order. He is popularly supposed to have no heart. Very often the vox populi is wrong; and the Gaumont Company has done well in making the policeman the hero of as pretty a little piece of dramatic comedy as we have recently seen. A young couple have a sick child, but no money to buy the medicine which the doctor prescribes. The woman appeals to her relatives and they reluctantly part with some money, which, when the woman goes to the druggist for the necessary medicine and offers payment, she discovers to be false. The druggist, who is a hard man, gives her in custody of a policeman. She is taken to the police station and detained for inquiries. The policeman who makes the inquiries has a tender heart, and he finds out that her story is true. So, when he returns to the station he gives the druggist good money for the bad; the woman gets her medicine and the little family is made happy. The final scene of the play shows the woman thanking the policeman; and here comes in a very fine touch of pathetic sentiment. The good-hearted policeman deprecates excessive thanks, and, with a shrug, passes on his way as if assuring himself that he had done nothing particularly good. The picture is quite simple and unpretentious, but beautifully effective as a moving picture story. Again we congratulate Mr. Kleine on having got hold of a really splendid film. The photography is unexceptionally good, while the acting of the various characters is thoroughly natural. "A Good-Hearted Policeman" is a distinct success.

THE DUKE'S JESTER. (Vitagraph).

The source of the "book" of this picture is Italian, and the story itself has been made the basis of opera, novel and play times out of number. It is a very powerful story and yet a very simple one. A man's wife is torn from him and killed, and the child afterwards becomes a beautiful girl at the court of which her own father is jester. The father nourishes revenge, and in carrying that revenge into effect he sacrifices the honor of a woman to the lust of a villain, and discovers, when it is too late, that it is his own daughter who is the victim of his vindictiveness. This is the main thread of the story, which the exigencies of dramatic construction, either in novel, book or operatic form, occasionally allows to be varied. In selecting the subject for film treatment the Vitagraph Company has shown very considerable enterprise and great boldness. The story unfolds a series of elaborately mounted scenes. There are innumerable characters, all richly garbed, and, on the whole, with the series of pictures of Italian court life, the eye is undoubtedly pleased. It is a trial, of course, for American actors and actresses to attempt to simulate the manners, customs and emotions of Italian people of a past century; in fact, it is an enterprise of a very hazardous character. For the Italians, like the French, are born actors and actresses, which makes it all the more difficult for persons of a non-Latin origin to enter into their feelings; hence the extremely daring experiment of the Vitagraph producer. On the whole, he has come wonderfully well through an exceedingly difficult ordeal. In our opinion, however, he handicapped himself somewhat by overcrowding his canvas. There are, we venture to think, too many persons in these gorgeous court scenes. The work involved was surely not less than that which would be demanded in the production of a first-class historical drama at a Broadway theater. The wonder is, therefore, that the producer of this piece did so well with the enormous amount of material at his command. Here and there we thought that the action flagged; here and there, too, individual characters walked through rather than acted their parts. Murder and abduction were played in a very simple and unexciting way. But little minor deficiencies of this kind are inevitable in a production which seeks to compress into twenty minutes a wealth of acting which has held the greatest stages in the world for an entire evening. Operatically and dramatically, "The Fool" has given some of the best artists of the times their most ambitious opportunities. "The Duke's Jester" shows that the Vitagraph Company is in real earnest in grappling with the problems that lie before the maker of moving picture films, and determines to place itself in the front rank by sheer force of quality. Scenic, photographic and other good qualities are visible in this splendid picture. It is so good that we are justified in looking for yet further improvement in the dramatic and producing departments from the capable hands that have put this ambitious "Duke's Jester" before the public.

THE COWBOY'S NARROW ESCAPE. (N. Y. M. P. Co.)

The producers of this interesting picture have gone about the work of making it in such a common sense fashion that hypercriticism is disarmed, and we should think that the picture is one that would successfully appeal on its merits to the very large class of lovers of Indian subjects. The book has been written by an Indian author, and in the piece itself there are Indian characters and a man who followed the profession of cowboy. This is carrying out our last week's suggestion and going straight to nature. The story is roughly that of the robbery by a cowboy, Bad Bill, from a Western saloon, the proprietor of which also suffers at the hands of said Bill. An Indian boy witnesses the double crime and suffers for his unfortunate knowledge by being lassoed and flung over a cliff. He is rescued from death by a brave Indian girl, his sister. Another cowboy who discovers the saloonkeeper dead also suffers at the hands of the villains, who are just going to hang him when he is also rescued by the girl. Bad Bill is run to earth on the testimony of the Indian and all ends happily, so happily indeed that the saloonkeeper was only injured. This is a rough outline of a very simple, probable story, written by one who has a personal knowledge of the life illustrated. We were pleased to notice some very powerful and convincing bits of acting in the piece, the Indian, his sister and Bad Bill being especially fine in their work, and the whole business was extremely well stage managed throughout. And as the photographic end of matters was carefully done, the picture giving every evidence of careful printing, we think this will be a very popular subject with the frequenters of moving picture theaters. The independent exchanges should encourage the New York Motion Picture Company in their work. They are evidently engaging the right kind of talent, and we think that they have all the capacity for making a great success of their pictures.

VITAGRAPH'S WASHINGTON PICTURES.

Apart from the excellent technique, the first reel, "Washington Under the British Flag," possesses no great interest, as the possibilities for dramatic excellence were limited in the subject. This has been redeemed in the second reel, "Washington Under the American Flag," which is a masterly production and brings out several events in the life of the Father of Our Country with convincing clearness and remarkable success. In this the part of Washington is taken by an actor of international fame and who bore the honors of the part to perfection. Even in the minutest details it is evident that the Vitagraph Company has spread itself to make this film historically accurate and pictorially perfect. The toning of the various scenes is tastefully done, and in one scene a double tone effect is produced which has almost the effect of hand coloring. It is doubtful if the demand for a historical subject will bring to the Vitagraph Company sufficient extra orders for this film to warrant the evident expense and time that were spent upon its production. We hope that it will meet with the demand that it deserves, but if disappointed it will at least serve to well advertise the fact that the Vitagraph Company is in the front rank of producers, and that nothing is beyond their ambition or powers to perform.

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE (Great Northern).

The producing staff of the Great Northern Film Company are, we have no doubt, attentive readers of the Moving Picture World, the only publication of its kind in the world devoted to the moving picture, which insists week by week upon the employment of a definite formula in the making of moving pictures, namely (to run the risk of repeating ourselves), a good story, simply and clearly told and well photographed. Therein lies the secret of success; therein lies the secret of the creation of an international moving picture drama. In other words, the preparation and production of plays which are understood at a glance by people in all parts of the world. Think of it, now! This Great Northern picture was made in far off Copenhagen, the capital city of Denmark, and, to us, in the ultra modern metropolis of the New World, the action of the piece is as clear as daylight. Now, that is what is wanted in moving picture story telling—no ambiguity, doubt or obscurity. "A Woman of the People" is another Great Northern success, simply because it fulfills the formula above quoted. Here is the story: A rich manufacturer falls in love with one of his girl employees, but the father, who is also an employee, objects and is discharged. There are some very prettily acted love scenes between the manufacturer and the girl, who subsequently is cast off and satisfied, it would seem, by means of a payment of a sum of money. The father is very angry on discovering the source of this money, and the girl suffers bitterly for her indiscretions. Meanwhile, the rich manufacturer, in a very charming scene of ambrosial pleasure, is betrothed and he has just kissed the new girl to whom he is engaged, when the father of the wronged girl appears and denounces him. A footman tries to eject him and is promptly knocked down, a very fine piece of acting. There are many fine pieces of acting in this picture. Subsequently a fire ruins the manufacturer and he is deserted by all his former friends. An invention makes the discharged workman wealthy. Now comes his turn to heap coals of fire on the head of his former employer, but the proffered money is rejected. Finally a via media is sought by the direct intervention of the discarded girl. This paves the way for a reconciliation between the girl and her former lover, and the picture ends happily, as all pictures should. The photography of this picture is up to the fine standard which the Great Northern Company have set for themselves, the tints and tones being judiciously chosen. What we like about it, however, is the intense realism of the acting. Every word, every gesture of the principal characters in this piece is a masterpiece of carefully studied histrionics. This is another case where the illusion is so perfect that one seems, as it were, to be looking at scenes from life itself. Great Northern films, which are going from success to success, have a polish and finish about them which give them that distinction of quality which lifts the moving picture onto the plane of the pictorial.

"The Little Peacemaker."—When the Essanay people attempt to make a comedy they usually produce something so different from any one else and so individual in conception and action that the interest of the audience is closely held from first to last. The acting in this skit is so natural and the boy develops his part of the story so easily that it doesn't seem to be acting at all. The final making up of the disgruntled lovers has so much genuine humor in it that the audience involuntarily laughs outright. The photography of the film is fair, but in places falls below the standard which should be set by all the leading houses.

"The Energetic Advertiser."—A comical skit from the Essanay studio which gives outdoor advertisers some points in developing their business. While it might not be either safe or desirable to undertake a repetition of this outdoor man's methods, it will be generally admitted that if an advertiser really did as this picture represents he would get a class of advertising he might not like. The acting is grand, and as most of the action occurs out of doors the staging has plenty of room. The photography alone could be improved.

"Modern Algeria."—An Eclipse picture representing various scenes in Algeria. Most of the scenic work is sufficiently pictorial to be attractive, and a few interesting features, such as the climbing of palm trees and two street scenes, are especially good. The quality of the picture is good. The tones are maintained, and, even with all the movement in the street scenes, little blurring occurs.

"The New Footman."—A comedy from the Eclipse studio which is good photographically, but represents scarcely anything that entitles it to a long run. The conception of a suitor introducing himself into the family as a servant is not new, and no important new feature was connected with it in this instance. Such elaborate staging and such good photography should not have been wasted on this inconsequential subject. That the new footman finally marries the daughter does not add materially to the interest of the picture.

"The Reckoning."—A film d'art from the Pathes which presents stronger dramatic possibilities and development than any film since La Tosca. Mr. Krause, who acts the leading part—that of the injured husband with a weakened heart—is well worth seeing. His acting speaks from the screen, and one can hear the words he utters as he discovers the perfidy of his wife. Supposing him dead, his wife and her lover proceed with their amours in the room with the body. His face, when he comes to himself and comprehends the situation, will never be forgotten if it is once seen. Like a fiend, he seizes the lover by the throat and strangles him, throwing the body into the chair he himself previously occupied. The strangled man's features are horrible enough to shock the most callous nerves. Then, as his wife returns, he forces her to kiss the lips of her dead lover and hurls her senseless to the floor, and, turning, rushes from the room. It is one of those splendid pieces of work which the Pathes turn out. Dramatically it could not be improved, and it is likewise mechanically perfect.

"Faded Lilies."—One of those pathetic dramas by the Biograph company which grips the heart and actually forces one to follow the story to the end regardless of whether one likes it or not. The death scene is so realistic that the audience scarcely breathes when the man is passing through the mental agonies attendant upon his discovery of the deception which had been worked upon him and the physical agony of approaching death. The woman's part was taken by one whose face is new in the Biograph pictures. She is no better than those who have acted such parts before, but her acting was good and she correctly interpreted the part. Photographically little was to be desired. The lighting appears a bit harsh in places, but in the main it is quite satisfactory.

"Her First Biscuits."—A Biograph comedy in which is concealed a moral for brides, or those about to become brides, and a sort of back-hand slap at cooking schools. It is none the less funny, even though it is realized that both features are considerably exaggerated. The facial expressions after eating of the biscuits are varied, but all express one thing—pain. Photographically the film is good, though the lights and shadows are all rather strong. They are good blacks and whites at any rate, and emphasized colors are better than the gloom which sometimes characterizes motion pictures.

"The Strenuous Sneezer."—A Pathe comedy, representing the serious consequences from the forcible sneezes of a powerfully built man. It serves to break the strain after looking at tragedy, and as a comedy has no objectionable features. Mechanically it would be difficult to improve.

"In the Sultan's Power."—Selig is developing a new type of pictures and is offering those with an Oriental setting, and is measurably successful in the production of this type. Many details are not yet adjusted satisfactorily, but each succeeding picture is better than the one before it, both in staging and acting. By far the best piece of work in this one is the acting of Jack, which is so coldly self-reliant that it startles those Orientals who are used to having every one cringe before them. And when he walks away from before the leveled rifles free he does it so nonchalantly that the audience applauds. The story goes on to include the capture of the Sultan and the release of the girl, but, after Jack's release, the rest of the play is tame. The staging is reasonably good, and the lighting of the various scenes is, perhaps, as good as could reasonably be expected. The picture is well worth seeing and deserves a long run.

"Flossie's New Peach Basket."—A Lubin comedy which cleverly represents the vicissitudes of a peach basket hat brought to the house untrimmed. After being used for almost every purpose for which a hod is available, it is finally trimmed and is seen resting upon Flossie's head, the embodiment of modern peach basket complication.

"Curing a Jealous Husband."—A Lubin comedy which shows what happened to a man who was so jealous of his wife that he even thrashed the postman for handing her a letter. But, after the arrival of a friend, the tables are turned, and the husband is cured in a series of lessons which combined some very unpalatable experiences. But the cure was complete, and the audience applauded the wife for arranging her graded lessons so cleverly.

"Debut of an Alpinist."—In this Lux film the panorama of the Alps, or what represents the Alps, is well conceived, but photography is poor and the pictures are far too weak to be impressive. It may be that this would be accepted as comedy abroad, but to see even a man dressed in skirts tumbling about like the one here represented is far too suggestive, or even coarse, for the average American audience, and the picture gets scarcely a semblance of a laugh. Such pictures are not enjoyed by American audiences, and are merely tolerated when shown. Nor is it necessary to descend to vulgarity in preparing a picture of mountain climbing, even when some comedy is introduced. The Lux people have clearly made a mistake in this picture, and should correct it before they send any more such films to America.

"Count of Monte Cristo."—This film was seen at an independent theater and showed no manufacturer's mark. Whether it is new or old does not appear from any lists available. It is mentioned for the purpose of saying that if it was duped the real manufacturer should proceed with all possible dispatch. If it is an original film the work was very poorly done. In scarcely any place was the photography up to the standard. Perhaps that should be modified a bit by saying that in only two scenes were the tone values what they should be. The rest of the film was poor; in some places so dim it was practically impossible to distinguish objects not in the immediate foreground. In the acting Dantes was fair, but none of the rest of the actors showed any spirit or any life. When it is considered that the story from which this film was made offers as many dramatic possibilities as any story ever written the picture is a disappointment. Whoever arranged the scenes would have done better if he had read the book before staging the play.

"Weary Willie Wheeling."—A Wrench film which offers to American audiences another of those broad foreign conceptions of humor which it is difficult to appreciate. Why the foreign humorists insist upon representing women in such a suggestive way is beyond comprehension. Women can do funny things without descending to anything coarse and suggestive, and that occurs far too frequently in this picture. The whole conception is weak and the fun seems far-fetched and requiring a diagram to explain it. Photographically it is good, and it seems a pity that the excellent technical quality should be wasted upon such an unsatisfactory and trivial subject.

"A Good Birthday Present."—A comedy from Pathe which has some elements of fun, though it must be confessed that, as a whole, it is disappointing. The attempt of the recipient to get the huge case home is funny enough, but to smash everything in his own and his neighbor's apartments is too silly to be laughed at even. And then, when the case is opened, to discover that it contains an elderly woman, evidently the gentleman's mother-in-law, offers no particular humorous feature. Such pictures may seem hilariously funny abroad, but Americans do not appreciate that type of humor.

"Making Lace."—An industrial picture from the Pathe studio which shows clearly the operation of making some of the beautiful laces which come from abroad. It is interesting to observe that children and their grandmothers are alike expert in this work. The instruments for making it will be a revelation to substantially every one who sees the picture. Such industrial subjects, showing excellent technical quality, are to be commended. They disseminate a knowledge of different varieties of work which could be obtained by so many people in no other way.

"Poor Little Kiddies."—A beautifully colored Pathe production which tells a simple story of abduction and suffering of a child and its parents, which ends happily in the restoration of the child to his mother and the rescue of a little girl who had been his companion in captivity. Technically the film is almost flawless, but the story possesses comparatively little interest to most observers.

"The Plot That Failed."—A Vitagraph film which tells a novel story in an interesting way and holds the attention of the audience throughout. To drive away the occupants of a farm by constructing a series of ghosts is certainly novel enough to be interesting, and where the acting has the snap and go which is put into the work by the Vitagraph players it is all the better. And too much praise cannot be bestowed upon the determination of the farmer to trap the ghosts because he discovered their footprints. The kicking the pseudo-ghost received after he was released from the trap will probably be a vigorous memory to his dying day. It is such comedies as this which relieve the monotony of that long list of gloomy subjects by foreign manufacturers and cause one to believe that there is something really funny in the world.

"The Diamond Maker, or Fortune and Misfortune."—A Vitagraph drama which has many elements of strength and affords opportunity for some good acting. The panic of the diamond merchants when they discover the source of the supply is unquestionably a faithful reproduction of what would occur under such circumstances, and the smashing of the apparatus is graphic evidence of how easy it is to destroy the work of years. The actors seem to interpret the feelings and passions of those interested with reasonable accuracy, and the film is technically good, with the exception of weak photography here and there.

"The Cry from the Well."—One of those depressing pictures which contains a murder and leaves one in a disturbed state of mind. The photography is exceptionally good, and little fault can be found with the acting, but the subject is too depressing for the enjoyment of the average audience.

"Hunted to the End."—A Gaumont which illustrates a novel method of dealing with duelists. Perhaps if more of them were hunted down in this way duelling would shortly become a thing of the past. Two features deserve commendation: First, the suggestion for the treatment of silly duellists, and second, the fact that the audience is spared the sight of the duel itself. Photographically and pictorially the film is quite up to the Gaumont standard.

Curse of Cocaine.—This is a very impressive story and well told and well acted by the Essanay Company. Although it teaches a strong moral lesson, the question has been raised by some whether the suggestion would not have a malevolent influence on some minds. This is a matter that we prefer to leave in the hands of the Board of Censorship, whose duty it is to go deeper into the ethics of the problem they have in hand. What chiefly concerns us is the technique, and, as we have said, the presentation and action of this is wholly satisfactory—all except the photography. We have elsewhere remarked that one may forget that he is only looking at a picture when a perfect mimic drama is on the screen. But this can only happen when the photography is so good that we are not rudely reminded by the imperfection that it is a photograph. The white patches that were supposed to represent faces in this film were so ghastly that we charitably supposed it must have been a "dupe."

"A Rural Tragedy."—Something in this drama from the Edison studio will appeal to every lover of good pictures combined with a good story. Sometimes one tires of these stories with a gloomy ending, a story in which one or more must die. It seems as though these stories might be made just as interesting without the necessity of someone dying. Several good features are introduced in this film. One is the scene showing how an improvised fire brigade works in the country. This scene represents one phase of life in the country very clearly. Dramatically the film is good. This particular company is setting a standard for dramatic quality which makes some of the Edison films especially attractive. The photography is of good quality, with the tone values maintained throughout and an almost total absence of uneven lighting. Love stories are always interesting, but in this one a touch of sadness is given to it by the death of one of the young men. The best acted part in the play is the blind girl.

"Stolen by an Eagle."—A Le Lion film which goes to the limit of naturalism. It makes the audience catch its breath when an eagle swoops down and carries away the child from its crib. The only thing that mars the picture is the long climb to the top of the mountain. One gets nervous about the baby long before the searchers reach the eagle's nest. The photographic quality is excellent, in only a few places is the lighting weak or harsh, and when the character of the picture and the difficulties are remembered this seems remarkable.

"Land of the Pharaohs."—A Hepworth which gives a fair idea of life in Egypt, but is marred by poor photographic quality. The lighting is so dim in places that it is almost impossible to distinguish the figures. When a picture like this is run by a careless or poor operator the effect is anything but pleasing.

"France at War in Morocco."—A Warwick film which gives some interesting scenes in Morocco, devoting most of its attention to the field hospital department. A few scenes of men on the march and here and there a view of the armies in camp constitute the whole of the picture. Photographically it is below standard. The lighting is poor, dim in some places and harsh in others. This house has done better many times and should be able to do better in a picture of this sort.

"Good for Nothing Nephew."—An Itala which presents a few elements of comedy in a nephew who spends his patrimony, and when he follows his uncle's direction to hang himself in a certain place, pulls down the ceiling, which is found to be lined with bank notes. Photographically the film is good, but the story is without much point.

"A Mother's Choice."—A picture from the Gaumont studio which grips the heart and was more vigorously applauded when seen by the writer than any which has come out in some time. The climax is not reached until the very last, when the mother finally decides to retain her son and allow her second husband to go. Up to that point, while the picture tells a genuine story, vital with suggestion, the acting is not out of the ordinary. Indeed, perhaps it doesn't need to be. Sometimes the apparent lack of acting proves to be really the best and it may be so in this instance. But the story leads naturally up to the climax where the mother makes her choice. And as the maid closes the doors, shutting the step-father out, and the mother clasps her son in her arms, the audience breaks into applause. Technically the film could scarcely be improved. The tones are good and there is a strength in the picture which makes it very satisfactory to look at.

"A Friend in Need is a Friend Indeed."—A Vitagraph illustration of this old saying which is much too sober to be really attractive, though possibly the eleventh hour change of heart of the grouchy manager, represented in his contribution of money and the belated letter of sympathy, may atone in some degree for former unpleasantness, yet even that does not dispel the gloom caused by the death of the wife. The only real pleasant feature of the picture is the kindly sympathy of the fellow employees. The brown tone descends to mere gloom in places, and is too much disposed to white in others, yet in the main the tone is even and the picture not unattractive technically. They remembered one detail in the office which many forget. The office clock actually moved forward with the passage of the day. In a good many instances it is permitted to stand still.

"Mr. Physical Culture's Surprise Party."—A short comedy from the Vitagraph studio which illustrates the plight a physical culturist found himself in when he refused to dress and a surprise party swooped down on him to celebrate his birthday.

"The Violin Maker of Cremona."—When the capable Biograph Company undertakes to tell a love story they tell it so forcibly, and yet so tenderly, that it lingers in the memory like some sweet dream. Here is a tale of love and sacrifice and when the young violin maker smashes the instrument which would win him the fair girl's hand, so that his rival, whom the girl loves, can win, the intensity of anguish which bursts forth in that blow will not soon be forgotten. The entire film abounds in strong situations, like the one where the cripple exchanges the violins to make sure the rival wins, and again when the rival, not knowing what has been done, exchanges them again, thereby cutting off every possible chance of winning. Technically the film is good, with artistic grouping of characters and faithful tonal rendering of interiors. The technical quality of the Biograph films is steadily improving.

"The Legend of Sterling Keep."—An Edison film which tells an interesting story allowing scope for some good acting. The acting of the knight on whom the company played the joke rises far above the ordinary, particularly in that portion where the sight of the false burial tablet temporarily destroys his reason. The rest of the acting, while full of movement and gayety, is not especially strong. The pictorial quality of the film is exceptionally good and the tone values are maintained at a high level throughout, even when depicting difficult interiors. There is a depth and richness to the tones that adds greatly to the strength of the picture and makes it a pleasure to look at.

"Saucy Sue."—A Lubin skit which amusingly shows a very lively country girl in a series of pranks in the city which finally drive her relatives to send her back to the country to prevent an attack of nervous prostration.

"The Blue Legend."—A pathetic picture from the Pathes which is another page in the book of gloom that has been the rule this week. The acting goes well with subject and the technical quality is good. But it is not a picture one would care to see again.

"The Pulverizer."—One of those Pathe magic films which utilizes a powder to reduce different things to dust, and afterward reverses the process and reproduces them again.

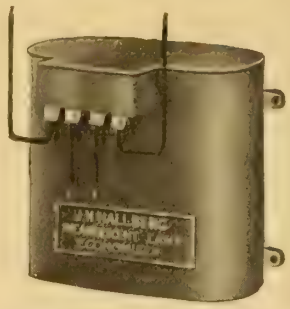
It is astonishing to note how rarely the moving picture is accurately staged; by staging we mean correctness as regards details of scenery, dress, furniture, etc. Only the other day we saw a great picture, the scene of which was laid in a distant foreign country, and yet the furniture in an interior scene belonged to American colonial days. Now this, as we have repeatedly pointed out in these pages, is an example of what is known as a glaring anachronism. How rarely the pictures are correctly produced, correctly lighted, etc.! These reflections were suggested to our mind by an interview with Mr. S. M. Jacobi, the art director of the Genuine Antique Shop, 34 East 30th street, New York city. The Genuine Antique Shop has retained Mr. Jacobi's services in a new capacity, which, we think, should be of great value to moving picture film makers.

Mr. Jacobi, a trained artist and authority on artistic matters generally, has had wide experience in theatrical producing, and also in supplying the furniture, dresses, costumes and accessories for notable productions. The Genuine Antique Store possesses a unique collection of very beautiful paintings, furniture, costumes and refined accessories, which it is willing to let out on hire to moving picture makers who are anxious to have their historical and other productions accurate in respect of accessories and costumes. This is a very important point, as everybody who has the smallest regard for the welfare of the moving picture must realize. At the Genuine Antique Store you see relics of the Colonial period, paneling from old chateaux in France, and even the very finest of furniture from Fraunce's Tavern, where George Washington met his officers, so that there is a good collection from which to choose. Mr. Jacobi has given attention to the moving picture for a great many years, both in Paris and New York. Besides being an artist, he is a trained photographer, and his services are to be available for the designing of studios for moving picture work and generally in the production of the picture with regard to its accurate presentation, photographic lighting, grouping, etc. We advise all to get in touch with the Genuine Antique Shop at the address given, either by mail or, better still, by a personal visit. We feel convinced that they will come away as we did; namely, with a feeling of envy for the treasures it contains—treasures that will look good in a moving picture.

"HALLBERG" INCANDESCENT LAMP ECONOMIZER.

A matter of much importance to users of incandescent lamps, especially for lobby and sign lighting, where 4 and 6-candlepower lamps are used, is the "Hallberg" incandescent lamp economizer and new low candlepower lamp.

To give an illustration of the enormous value of this system the following example may be given: A moving picture, or other theater, usually has from 25 to 400 four to eight-candlepower lamps in the lobby and sign. Assuming that 150 four-candlepower lamps are installed, the current consumed is 20 watts per lamp, or three kilowatts per hour for 150 four-candlepower lamps. At the 10c. rate, 30c. per hour for three hours per night and 26 days, the cost is about $23.40 per month



With the "Hallberg" system, the lamps would require only five watts each per hour, showing a saving of about 75 per cent. on the bill. This would reduce the bill of $23.40 per month to $5.85, giving a saving on the current bill of $17.55 per month. Besides this saving, the light is white instead of yellow and more attractive.

This new economizer and lamps are ready for immediate delivery, and thousands of lamps are already in service, giving excellent satisfaction. Among a few important installations in the vicinity of New York we may mention William Willett, Jr., Rockaway Beach, N. Y.; E. S. Oates, Rockaway Beach; Wainwright & Smith, Rockaway Beach; Chas. Schilling, Rockaway Beach; United Electric Light and Power Co. and Hotel Astor, New York city.

FILM IMPORT & TRADING CO. IN NEW QUARTERS.

This week the effects of the Film Import & Trading Co. were removed to a handsomely appointed floor in the office building at 127 East 23d street. The change in this firm, which includes the officers and most of the employees, even to the furniture, is so complete that there is little left except the title of the firm. The layout of the new offices has been well designed, occupying the entire front, and in the rear the rental department has been taken care of in a specially designed space which permits the handling and inspction of the films with the greatest facility. Evidently this concern has taken a new lease of life.

5-CENT SHOW ACTORS STRIKE IN CHICAGO.

A strike and boycott by all union vaudeville "artists" against the Royal 5-cent theater, 232 North Clark street, the United Booking Agency, conducted by Washburn & Irwin, and Robert Friedlander, a booking agent, were ordered by the Actors' union. This, the first strike declared by the nickel theater performers in Chicago, was voted at a meeting of the union held in the afternoon at 164 Randolph street.

All union actors were ordered to keep away from the theater and from the two booking offices, whose managers incurred the wrath of the performers by failing to comply with the new rule of the union limiting the number of "shows" to four a day and eight on Saturday and Sunday.

The trouble arose over the cancellation of a contract made by George Yortzes, manager of the Royal Theater, with Business Agent F. E. Earnshaw, of the Actors' Union. According to Business Agent Earnshaw, Yortzes agreed to pay the scale of $20 a week for single performers and $40 a week for teams and overtime for all performances required of the actors over four a day.

"After Yortzes signed the agreement with us he went to the United Agency and to Friedlander, who promised to furnish all the talent he wanted at the regular scale, without overtime pay for performances above the limit," said Earnshaw. "Then he came back to us and ordered his contract canceled. The violation was reported to the union, which was in session, and the strike and boycott were ordered."

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

The Buffalo Film Exchange has removed from 13 E. Genesee street to 272 Washington street, increased business requiring more commodious premises. 'Phone numbers: Bell, Seneca 91; Frontier, 2778.

We desire to call the special attention of our readers to advertisement in this week's issue of the Novelty Slide Company's special Fourth of July slides. This concern makes a feature of special slides for all events, and their work is of the very highest quality.

The Eagle Film Exchange is said to be one of the largest buyers of independent films, and the steady increase in their volume of business commends their policy.

Bill Steiner, he of the Imperial Film Exchange, has increased his standing order with the manufacturers. This does not look as if business was falling off with him. But, then, it is said that this exchange is the heaviest buyer of any, compared with their share of the rental business.

THE SONGS.

The songs of the week have been of an unusually high order of merit, and the illustrations accompanying them have been up to the standard of the songs. "Take Me Up With You, Dearie," which was illustrated by De Witt C. Wheeler, was one of the best in several weeks. Mr. Wheeler produced some novel effects in his slides, showing air ships sailing among the clouds, which ranks them among the best slides of the season.

Songs illustrated by A. L. Simpson, Scott & Van Altena, Harstn & Co. and Levy have been among those sung during the week and the pictures have been exceptionally good. Perhaps this is due to the fact that they have had better material to work with; perhaps it is some other cause, but whatever the cause there is no question about the improvement in the quality of the songs and the illustrations, and this feature will appeal to managers.

A song which is adequately illustrated is a great addition to a programme. And the steady improvement during the past few weeks warrants the belief that managers will no longer have difficulty in securing good songs sympathetically and attractively illustrated. They cost no more and their drawing power in a programme is that much greater.

THE LECTURES.

One sometimes wonders whether it is advisable to split a lecture into six parts and distribute it through the week. The reasons for this may be two. One is the lecture is, perhaps, too long to be delivered in one day. In some instances the lectures alone would more than fill the programme. The next reason is that possibly someone who hears part of a travelogue, as they are called, will come back for another part; but under most circumstances this would have no weight. Comparatively few come back the second day, though a good many will come back at some time during the week.

A short, well illustrated lecture always seems to please best. One last week at Keith's entitled "Log Driving" was exceptionally interesting and exceptionally well illustrated. It was just long enough and the interest of the audience was held throughout. This would seem to indicate the temper of the average audience. And perhaps it furnishes a hint for other managers in making up a satisfactory programme.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IF A BOARD OF CENSORSHIP, LET IT BE THOROUGH AND NATIONAL.

New York, June 22, 1909.

Editor THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Dear Sir:—On such occasions as Lincoln's birthday, Washington's birthday, Decoration Day, Flag Day, Fourth of July, etc., the church workers and school board members, composing our New York Board of Censorship, make long and patriotic speeches, in which they never fail to show the great influence that mothers had on the lives of our great men who made of this Republic one of the greatest nations.

It is true that all the men who, as Washington, Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, etc., loved and respected their parents are the men who respect their families, their employers, their fellow citizens, their country and their flag, men who have the sense of duty, men of real patriotism.

On the other hand, the men who do not respect their parents cannot respect their families, less their employers and fellow citizens, and have no use for their flag, except to use it as an advertising sign. You do not find the deeds of these men recorded in the books of our national history, as such deeds are the ones filling our prisons.

The members of our New York Board of Censorship seem to have a double policy. They pass and accept moving pictures teaching the reverse of what they are preaching in their patriotic speeches, and this under the excuse of strong moral lessons.

One of the accepted films shows us an unnatural son. The old man turns his property, including a saw mill, over to a son This son takes charge of the estate, and, because the father is not willing to give up every cent, the unnatural son beats him throws him on the floor and robs him. When the old father is deprived of his saw mill, of his estate, of his home, of his savings, etc., the son calls up the poor-house wagon to take the old man away.

I fail to see any strong moral lesson in this film, but I see a very deplorable lesson; and, if our young generation is taught to ill-treat and rob their parents, Washington, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, etc., will have no successors to continue the national history of this glorious Republic.

It is time that our New York Board of Censorship should be called down on a number of films which should not have passed the board.

If you are interested in a movement to establish a liberal, fair-minded and honest board, to take the interests of the manufacturer and the exhibitor, as well as the public, I will be pleased to call on you, if you can give me an interview, and will show you several papers on the question.

I am informed that the present New York Board of Censorship is trying to infuse some new blood in their organization by making it a national board. Let it be local, national or international, no board can succeed if the members are not cool, sober fair and liberal-minded men. I do not believe that we should show a burglar at his professional tricks, yet I do not see why the film, "The Lonely Villa," should be rejected by Chicago In other words, the members of a board of censorship should be intelligent enough to know when the sight of a night shirt is indecent or not, and not reject a picture because a night shirt is shown on the screen.

JOHN M. BRADLEY.

159 W. 36th street, New York.

TO ALABAMA EXHIBITORS

Dothan, Ala., June 12.

Let us get together and organize an association of exhibitors for our State. The other States are organizing, and we should not be the last to fall in line. We would be in better shape to upbuild the moving picture business. It is possible for a national association to be formed, and we should be ready to join them. Besides, all other branches of the business are organized, and we certainly should be. Dothan is a noted city for conventions and many have been formed here that have become a noted success. This city, which is composed of as good people as there are any where, will welcome you and entertain you royally. Kindly let me have your views on this matter.

Respectfully,

H. J. MORRIS.

Electric Theatre, Dothan, Ala.

[From the Photo-Miniature.]

Unevenness of development, with patchiness of density, is probably caused by the films not being kept moving in the developer. Light bands down the centers of the films may be caused by allowing the film, during development, to float on the top of the solution instead of evenly immersing it all over. Circular spots lighter than the surrounding portions are due to air-bells forming on the emulsion side of the film. To prevent these and the previous defect, keep the films on the move during development. Yellow stains in the clear portions of the negative may be due to (1) unfixed silver, (2) the use of caustic alkalies (potassium hydrate or sodium hydrate) in the developer. In the first case refix in a slightly acid fixing bath, in the second try reduction in Farmer's solution—hyposulphite of sodium fixing bath, to which a few small crystals of red prussiate of potash have been added. Reddish brown stains on the film when dry are probably caused by exposure of the film to white light during fixation; remedy, Farmer's reducer, as aforesaid. Frilling of the gelatine film is caused by too high a temperature of the solution (which should never exceed 60 degrees to 65 degrees Fahr.) or excessive quantities of caustic alkalies. Uneven fixation resulting in circular marks on the film is caused by the film not having been well immersed in the hypo solution. Scratches and markings in the film may be due to rough handling of the films in the solution and developing too many at once. Adhesion of the films during drying will cause the gelatine to become torn. They should be pinned up, with sufficient space between them, in a room where there is a good current of air. Pinholes are caused by dust on the film during exposure or development. Bubbles are caused by air in the developer or froth upon it, or by uneven flowing of the solution. Fog on the films may be due to an unsafe dark-room light, a defective camera, over-exposure, forced development, or to improperly kept film. Patches of uneven density on the films are frequently caused by using a rapid action developer and by placing a number of films in one dish. Slow developers are preferable for the work.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE WAY OF MAN.—One of the most insincere maxims is "Beauty is only skin deeps," for we all know that appearances are everything and the expression "Pretty is as pretty does" has often proven itself to be obvious satire. The pretty face impresses itself indelibly on the heart, and the homely woman is, sad to say, an aversion. This fact is clearly set forth in this Biograph story. Tom Horne deeply loved pretty little Mabel Jarrett, and that his love was returned goes without saying. Tom's ebullient ambition is intensified by his great love for the girl, so he decides to go out West to fight for fame and fortune to be more worthy of her. After some time in the land of promise he succeeds in attaining the end for which he had striven and writes of his intention to return and claim her for his own. Meanwhile, Mabel's cousin Winnie has visited her and is to spend the Summer months. At the receipt of Tom's letter, Mabel is in the seventh heaven of delight, when cruel fate plunges her into the depths of despair, for a horrible accident occurs. During the evening, while Mabel is in the act of lighting the lamp, it explodes, frightfully burning her face and head. It is conclusive that the poor girl will be disfigured for life. What a blow it is to her almost on the eve of Tom's return! They all try to cheer her, although fully realizing her sad plight. Winnie in particular does her best to allay her anticipating fears. However, Tom arrives and is dreadfully shocked at Mabel's appearance. This wounds Mabel, but he makes an effort to dissemble and make her believe that the awful scar will make no difference; will not lessen his affection for her, or dissipate his desire to make her his wife. But, ah, mere words are empty, and poor Mabel can see a tinge of repugnance in his attitude, and discerns a decided attachment between her cousin and Tom. Winnie realizes this also, and tries to leave the place to be out of the way. Mabel discovers this sacrificial move on the part of Winnie and prevents it by making the sacrifice herself. Leaving a note bidding all farewell, and hoping Tom and Winnie will be married, she goes from the house and makes her way to the coast. Placing her cloak and hat on the high rocky cliff, she hides, so they at once assume she has jumped into the sea. When they have left for the house, all mourning the brave girl as dead, she then goes and enlists her services at an orphan asylum to take care of the poor, homeless foundlings. Later Tom and Winnie are happily married, both holding a tender, reverent remembrance for the brave self-sacrificing girl whom they imagine buried in the dark waters of the remorseless, restless sea. Length, 986 feet.

THE NECKLACE.—Vanity is the foundation of the most ridiculous and contemptible vices—the vices of affectation and common lying. Vanity is often called pride, but it is not, for pride makes us esteem ourselves, while vanity makes us desire the esteem of others, and pride is uplifting, but vanity is its own foe. Miss Louise Leroque was one of those charming young ladies, born, as if through an error of destiny, into a family of clerks, and after she married John Kendrick, she suffered an incessant yearning for all those delicacies and luxuries she felt were her due. John was a big-hearted, indulgent husband whose every thought was for his wife's happiness, and while Louise was a devoted wife, still there was the strain of selfishness ever apparent, for she who studies her glass neglects her heart. She yearned for ostentation, and poor John was in no position to appease this desire. However, an occasion presents itself when they can at least bask in the radiance of the social limelight, in an invitation to attend a reception tendered a foreign prince. John is in the height of elation, but Louise meets him with that time-honored remark, "I've nothing to wear." Well, he feels the strength of her argument, so goes and pawns his watch and chain to procure her a gown fitting for the occasion. The gown emphasizes the absence of jewel ornamentation, so they visit their friend and neighbor, who lends them a handsome necklace. At the reception she makes quite a stir and is presented to the prince, who becomes decidedly attentive. Arriving home after the affair, Louise rehearses the incidents of the event, when suddenly she stands petrified with horror. "My God! the necklace is gone." High and low they search, and even back to the ballroom, but without result, for we have seen it stolen from her neck by a sneak thief while she is talking with the prince. Unable to find the necklace, they swear to give their fingers to the bone, their life's blood until it is paid for. But then there is the humiliation of not returning the jewels, so they hunt for a duplicate. At the jeweler's they find one, in appearance an exact copy, but the price is $20,000. Twenty thousand dollars to ones in their condition meant a large fortune. However, John borrows money on his salary, gets loans from his various friends and is granted a large advance by his employer, giving notes for same; in fact, mortgaging his very life as the result of vanity. With the money he purchases the duplicate and gives it to their friend, who is unaware of the substitution. Meanwhile, the thief has taken the necklace to a pawnshop and finds it is a worthless imitation, and so throws it into the rubbish heap. Five years later we find the couple toiling, toiling, but still in bondage; after night in the endeavor to make a little extra above his ordinary salary. Ten years we find them, still hounded by the note collectors, aged and broken in health, yet determined. Twenty years, and the last penny on the necklace is paid, but at the expense of their bodily strength. Having cleared up his debt with his employer, he is discharged, being too feeble to do the work. As a last resort they write to their friend, confessing the substitution of the jewels, and their plight as a result, begging that she give them some slight assistance. Treir friend, of course, is amazed, she cognizant of the worthlessness of her property, so hastens to give Louise back the jewels, arriving only in time to put them about her neck when she sinks back dead. John, poor fellow, is found sitting in a chair at the head of the bed, also dead. They had received vanity's reward. Length, 969 feet.

THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.—"Breathes there a man with soul so dead who never to himself hath said: 'This is my own, my native land.' "

It was Scott's immortal lines that are said to have inspired Edward Everett Hale when he wrote his celebrated novel, "The Man Without a Country," and no one can read that novel without his patriotism being strengthened and his heart beating just a little faster when next he chances to see his country's standard fluttering in the air.

Though the adaptation from the novel, a book known to every school child from coast to coast, in this new film has been freely made, its theme has been well preserved and its inspiration infused in every scene. No one can see it without being a better citizen, a better man or woman, so deeply does the pictured drama inculcate a nobler, higher patriotism. No expense has been spared to make the production notable and worthy of its subject. The scene depicting the deck of an old time frigate during a battle at sea is particularly strong and will rank, in point of action, fidelity to actual conditions and thoroughly sustained interest, among the noteworthy achievements of the film maker's art.

Lieut. Gaines, a naval constructor, is falsely accused of selling the plans of a new piece of ordnance to the enemy. He is tried by court-martial and condemned on purely circumstantial evidence. The apparent injustice of his trial stirs him to momentary wrath and he crushes the flag under his heel, loudly declaring he hopes he may never see or hear of his native country again. The court-martial alters its sentence and grants his wish. He is deprived of home, country and flag and placed in permanent banishment abroad.

His rage has long since expired ere he reaches foreign shores, and his pathetic longing for home and country, for the dear old flag, is vividly shown in the succeeding scenes. Everywhere scorned as a traitor, his life is pitiable. Americans refuse to associate with him; his every effort for the companionship of his countrymen and a welcome beneath the flag meets with rebuff.

He wanders near the docks where an American frigate is anchored, saves some American sailors from possible death at the hands of foreigners and is taken aboard the ship, having sustained injuries himself. The vessel puts to sea and encounters the enemy. He wants to fight, but he has been recognized now and his wish is refused. At last a shot carries away the standard; with a wild shout he leaps forward, seizes the flag and dashes up the rat-lines. Up he goes midst shot and shell, up, up and up to the shattered masthead, where he fastens the flag just as a shell sends him crashing to the deck. He has redeemed himself. The officers and men stand with bared heads and a flag is draped across his dead body. Length, 1,000 feet.

PARTED ON THEIR HONEYMOON.—They found themselves in love by the seashore, the pounding of the surf was the accompaniment to Cupid's murmurings. Fresh, fragrant, strong grew their love. Communion over the ice cream at a social function increased the ardor and then at last, at last they stood before one garbed in the cloth and listened raptly to the words of the ceremony, responding eagerly to the questions. But the words of the ceremony had scarce echoed off to space ere fate, lusty and vigorous, stepped between and parted them.

Not for long did fate stand between them, however. With lover's cunning they met again and soon, behind a trusty steed, they were speeding to the seclusion, peace and safety of that lover's elysium—a wilderness. Roads ended, they were lost. A trusted friend who had accompanied them stole away during the night as they slumbered 'midst leaves and grass, a trusted friend, but one who betrayed. As they dreamt sweet dreams this friend most foul brought their pursuers to them and that honeymoon of ethereal bliss ended in—resounding spanks.

Spanks, certainly. The elopers were blessed eight years each of life and their mammas spanked them with right good will for their childish prank.

It is a pretty tale, fanciful, graceful and pleasing. Writ in childhood with a melodramatic atmosphere and a film that is not only different, but a genuine delight.

The marriage was a humorous idea of their mothers at a birthday party given by the little girl, the preacher was a lad of six attired in ministerial garments. It was amusing until the children took the thing seriously, but to the spectators the entire story is entertaining from start to finish —the elopement in a cart drawn by a goat with a dog as companion especially so. Length, 690 feet.

HE WOULDN'T GO UNDER A LADDER.—"Superstitious Sam" everyone called Sam Land, the hustling real estate salesman, and with good reason. Hard-headed though he was about everything else, a prosaic of prosaics, yet he was soft about superstitions. If there was a belief of a superstitious nature afloat that Sam hadn't heard of it was a wonder and he believed implicitly in them all. His pet superstition, however, was that it meant twenty-four hours of the worst kind of bad luck if one walked under a ladder and it was this fond belief that cost him his first position in Pleasantville.

Connected with the rival realty dealer was another hustling salesman known as Jim Pickens. It was always a battle for customers between Jim and Sam and when Sam landed a particularly plethoric looking individual who was looking for a house and lot Jim was after the pair like a flash. He wouldn't have come anywhere near the deal if it hadn't been for Sam's ideas about walking under ladders. When he dodged the first one, and it was Sam's bad luck that day to encounter a number, Jim seized the opportunity to begin conversation with the customer. Sam got him back again, but another ladder caused him to walk around while the customer calmly passed under it. Again Jim embraced his opportunity and in the argument Sam knocked the ladder down. While he remained to straighten matter out with the irate gardener, Jim and the customer got away.

Again and again Sam's superstition worked to Jim's advantage and in the end Jim secured the customer for his firm. Sam was discharged and in his rage ran out, found a ladder leaning against a wall and walked under it repeatedly until superstition was dead within him at least. Length, 305 feet.

THE TRAMP STORY.—There never was a more picturesque character in all the world than the American tramp, yeggman, hobo. His mysterious comings and goings, and his occasional visits at our back doors often excites the desire to inquire of him: "What made you a tramp?"

This motion picture story, "The Tramp," tells the tragic story of the making of an American tramp.

Joe Brown is a jovial, good-natured blacksmith in a little town in the Lehigh Valley in New York, the beloved husband of a good wife and father of a sweet-faced girl of sixteen. They are living happily together, and with careful saving and hard work he has bought a modest little home. Nellie, being the prettiest girl in all the valley is courted by every farmer lad for miles around, but none of them seem to suit her, she declaring that no man in all New York State is good enough for her.

Brown is busily at work at his forge one day when a young stranger, leading a horse, appears. The horse has lost a shoe and during the replacing of another, Nellie appears on the scene. The young stranger is immediately smitten with the girl's winsome face and when she leaves he follows her. They meet later and he confesses his love for her. In the handsome young stranger Nellie at last finds her hero and after a short courtship, of which the girl does not inform her parents, he persuades her to elope with him. The next morning the father and mother discover the loss of their daughter; the mother becomes violently ill and her life despaired of.

The little country girl goes to the city with the young man and after a month, in which she implores him to marry her, he leaves her for another woman. Nellie returns to her home, heartbroken and ill, and after confessing the unhappy ending of her romance drops at her father's feet dead. The poor mother, frantic with shame and grief, survives her daughter by just a week or two, and the poor, grief-stricken blacksmith, his home wrecked, his happiness destroyed, finds solace in drink.

In the hope of finding the scoundrel who betrayed his daughter he becomes a tramp, and after several years' search encounters him in a barroom. Here the villain receives his just deserts, while the tramp leaves happier for having obtained the long-for revenge and the fulfillment of his oath.

This is a human story that will touch every heart. It is splendidly staged and cleverly acted, while the photography is exceptionally good. Length, 750 feet.

A CASE OF SELTZER.—A young dude insists upon masbing a girl who is passing and minding her own affairs. She turns him down coldly, but he still continues to shower his attentions upon her. Finally she breaks away from him and rushes to her home. Her brother and some of his friends are playing cards. She tells them of her episode, and they immediately devise a plan whereby they can give the flirt a lesson. One of the boys dresses in the girl's clothes, and the rest of the boys each take seltzer bottles, and go to do damage to the young man's appearance.

He is still waiting when they come out, and the masher thinks the boy dressed up is the girl. He immediately pounces upon her and endeavors to force his attentions upon her.

The boys with seltzer bottles now rush upon the scene while the man in feminine attire belabors the would-be masher with a parasol.

The masher gets all that is coming to him, and the boys return homeward much elated over the severe lesson they have administered to the impudent young man. Length, 250 feet.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine.)

SAVED FROM THE FLAMES.—An elderly lady has as her boon companion a pet dog. The visit of a grandson causes the woman to lavish her attentions upon him and neglect the dog. This causes the dog to seek vengeance upon the boy and he enters the bedroom of the latter, where he upsets a lighted lamp and causes a fire. When the mistress returns and finds the house afire she is greatly excited and worried lest the boy suffer harm. The dog goes to the rescue of the lad in the nick of time. This puts him in favor and he is fairly idolized for his brave act. Length, 453 feet.

NO APPETITE FOR DINNER.—A civilian had invited his friend, an army officer, to dine with him on a certain day.

On the date set the officer has just concluded dinner in his own compartments and is glancing over the paper when, from the date thereof, it occurs to him that he has forgotten about his engagement. At the home of the prospective host the appointment had also been overlooked, and, as the officer is announced, the family are about ready to leave the table. A second meal is prepared and both make every effort to relish the food, but as a matter of fact both feel satisfied with the first meal. Finally a mutual confession is given and all joint in the hearty laughter. Length, 430 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—

THE HAND BELL.—An old lady is seen begging by the wayside and the kindly disposed gentleman gives her a coin, but she proves to be a fairy, the last surviving member of the legend, "Thousand and One Nights," and rewards his kindness by presenting him a hand bell that simulates very mysterious qualities. With it he can surmount any nature of difficulty; silencing the janitor, secures attention at the post-office and insures protection from attack, but he is unable to appease the anger of his wife's mother and discouraged, he discards the talisman for which his subdued antagonists now attack him the more vigorously. Length, 420 feet.

THE SUNNY SOUTH OF FRANCE.—A delightfully pleasing series of views covering the most beautiful and romantic sections of Southern France.

Views presented: Old Marseille—American Battleships at Marseille—St. Raphael—Cannes—Antibes—Nice—Beaulieu—Monte Carlo—Menton.

Excellent photographic detail and perspective. Length, 535 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine)

THE PHANTOM SIRENS.—A pretty picture-story of the fabled sea-nymphs. Grand marine effects. Fishermen depart for the fisheries. En route they are attracted by the Sirens who invite them on to the rocks, but the alluring women vanish each time they are on the point of being overtaken. The men return home disconsolate, neglect their sweethearts, think of nothing but the Sirens and go back to Hypso. The female folk invoke the aid of the Statue of the Virgin and proceed to the Isle, where they present the Holy Cross to the Mermaids, who thereupon magically disappear in the sea. The girls take their places and the spell is broken—the sailors, on approaching, recognizing in the supposed Sirens their own lasses. Length, 727 feet.

RULERS OF THE WORLD.—A decidedly novel method of presenting a number of the foremost rulers of the world.

The nations represented are England, Germany, Russia, France, Spain and United States. Length, 265 feet.

THE STORY OF TWO LIVES.—In a plain little room of a tenement house lives a young lady with her sick mother whom she supports. She is blessed with a beautiful voice which is greatly admired by mother and friends. In the room below lives a young composer who is writing an opera with which he hopes to achieve fame and fortune. Suddenly he stops. He hears a fall in the room above him. Now his door is thrown open and the young lady from above calls excitedly for his assistance. He accompanies her to the room where he finds the mother prostrated upon the floor. A doctor is called but the mother is dead.

A month has passed. The girl is out of work and despondent. Her last hope lies in a bottle of poison which she bought with the intention of ending all her earthly troubles. Just then she hears a knock at the door. She hides the bottle in the table drawer and opens the door. The young composer enters, telling her that he feels lonely in his cold room and asking permission to share his meal with her. She meekly consents. He at once brings an arm full of eatables which she spreads upon the table. Tired and weak, the poor girl falls asleep. The young composer quietly slips some [illegible] the table drawer. There he sees the [illegible] is startled. He takes the bottle and [illegible] room. Awakening the girl finds the poison and at once recognizes the truth.

"THE RECKONING"

The next morning the girl goes out, her guitar in her hand, to earn money by singing along the highways. Her unusually fine voice as well as her appearance attacts attention and money is showered upon her. An old lady in an electric brougham stops in astonishment and after speaking to her hands her her visiting card and invites her to call. She then drives away. The young lady, overcome from lack of nourishment, faints. The cards is found in her possession and as the people think this to be her address they carry her to the home of the old lady where she is well taken care of.

Ten years have passed. The young lady has become a famous opera singer while the composer is on the verge of despair. His opera has been turned down by all the managers. He has no money to buy food and is turned out of his room by the heartless landlord. At this time the famous opera singer reads in the paper that although the composition of our young composer has received the highest reward, his opera will not be presented, but another one will be the feature of the next operatic season. The name electrifies the opera singer. She well remembers that it is he who saved her life many years ago. She quickly calls up the manager of the opera house and tells him that she will not sing except it be the leading part of the young composer's opera. She receives the promise of the opera being produces and quickly hurries away to bring the glad tidings to the young composer for whom she searched in vain so many years. He in despair had stuffed up the crevices of doors and windows and turned on the gas to do its deadly work. She calls for assistance. The door is broken in and the composer found nearly lifeless. He is quickly revived. Explanations follow and arm in arm the two leave the room. He saved her life years ago and she was glad to be able to do the same for him. From the love light in her eyes it may be seen that she will make his opera a great success. Length, 985 feet.

SAVED BY HIS SWEETHEART.—A rejected lover, to get revenge on his more fortunate rival, hires two crooks in company with whom he waylays the young man when at night he is leaving his sweetheart's home. They strike him down and thinking they had killed him, throw him into the river.

In her dream, the sweetheart sees the outrage committed. She quickly rises, dresses and alarms the police, whom she induces to seach for her lover. They find him drowning in the river and save him in the nick of time.

Now they go after the villain, whom they capture after many exciting incidents. He is identified by the convalescent and sent to jail. Length 440 feet.

THE HYPNOTIC CURE. Grandpa suffers very much from rheumatism. Incidentally he reads in the paper that Professor Hipp discovered a new hypnotic cure by which to cure rheumatism. He at once visits the Professor, who applies hypnotic treatment.

Just then the Professor is interrupted and called away. The hypnotism works and Grandpa begins to run. When the Professor notices that his patient has gone, he chases after him, and even though he enlists the aid of numerous people they are not able to catch Grandpa.

After the funniest chase ever seen in moving pictures, Grandpa reaches his home. He is cured of his rheumatism, but, oh! what a time he had. Length, 385 feet.

THE OYSTERMAN'S GOLD.—The day's work has been most successful as the boat return heavily laden. Right on the wharf the oysterman sells the entire load. He puts his gold into a bag and starts on his way home. Two helpers watch the transaction and decide to get possession of the oysterman's gold.

They follow him and high upon a cliff they attack him. There is a fierce struggle between the oysterman and one of the outlaws. Just when they are in a clinch the other pushes the two down the rocks, where he finds them afterward, lifeless. He takes the fisherman's gold and runs away, but is haunted by the dead man whose warning hand he continuously sees before him. His guilty conscience drives him towards the sea and from a high rock he jumps into a watery grave. Length, 720 feet.

MARY JANE VISITS HER COUNTRY COUSIN.—Mary Jane goes to the country. Her cousin takes her to the fair. The cousin has a good time, to the great embarrassment of Mary Jane.

After returning home the country cousin repeats the tricks he saw, to the delight of the country folks. Mary Jane, however, vows never again to accompany her country cousin. Length, 200 feet.

THE OLD ARMY CHEST. While standing on the porch of his home, Colonel May spies his daughter hand in hand with a young West Point cadet. He sends the girl into the house and tells the boy never to return again.

Hardly has the cadet returned to the barracks when he is notified that, owing to his high standing on the graduating list, he has been appointed to a captaincy in the Engineer Corps. He at once returns to Beatrice to tell her the good tidings; as a captain he is sure the Colonel will not refuse him. They enter the house and find the Colonel in the garret before an old army chest looking at memories of olden days. We see his thoughts depicted in moving picture. Among his treasured relics is an old flag which accompanied him through many battles. It is this flag the lovers take, and, hand in hand, they ask father for his blessing. His face becomes clouded in anger as he sees the young man again.

The young Captain presents his diploma and asks for the daughter's hand. Colonel May at last consents, saying, "It was not the appointment that did it, not that, but I could not refuse the plea of the old flag," thinking of his own young days of love when this very same flag brought him the hand of his dear departed. Length, 930 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

A WESTERN HERO.—An interesting and thrilling incident of Western frontier life in the early days is cleverly portrayed in this film which gives a vivid idea of the many barbarous acts perpetrated by the Indáns, causing the settlers to be ever on the alert and hold themselves ready to be equal to an emergency at all times. In the first picture we see pretty Marion, who is beloved by two young men; one of the pair, Bill, is a gruff creature who forces his attentions on the girl, only to meet with a cold rebuff. The other youth, Harry, is an army officer and stands in high favor with the girl and her father. The latter, who is a typical old settler, is noted for his skill in handling a rifle and spends his leisure hours scurrying through the mountains hunting. Bill is so persistent in his attempts to win the love of Marion that she is forced to call upon her father to protect her from his unwelcome attentions. The old fellow makes short work of the affair and unceremoniously orders Bill away from the place. Bill is so enraged that he vows vengeance and going to the Indian camp he forms a scheme whereby he will deliver up to them the successful lover, who is a hated enemy of the red man.

In the meantime Harry is called to another settlement, and taking the mail coach, bids his sweetheart good-bye, and is off. As the coach is driving along the lonely mountain road, the Indians keep a close lookout and follow it until it reaches a desolate spot, where one of the savages throws himself across the road which brings the coach to a sudden stop, for the driver is led to believe that the Indian has been injured. Immediately the red men come from their hiding places and attack the party, killing the driver and taking Harry a prisoner. Marion's father, who happens to be hunting in the section, views the proceedings, and rushing down the hill he throws his lasso over two of the Indians, and before they have time to protect themselves, he shoots them both. Following the savages as they trail along, the old man manages to mow them down until he finally liberates his friend and returns with him to the settlement. Length, 410 feet.

BROKE AGAIN.—This clever comedy which is full of droll situations, shows us the care-free manner in which the students of the Latin quarter live; they enjoy life in their own way, never thinking of to-morrow as long as there is a kind relative good-natured enough to shoulder the responsibilities and settle up their accounts. The principal character in this picture is a young medical student who has reached the limit of his allowance and finds himself engulfed in debt with no way of making good; for his relatives have lost faith in him and positively refused to aid him in any manner. He comes to his uncle and aunt, however, and makes one last plea for money, but to no avail, for they are determined in their purpose to let him earn his own living. The youth returns dejectedly to his companions who are as badly off as himself, and when he breaks the bad news to them it has a most depressing effect on them all. Their clever friend, however, soon finds a way out of the difficulty; he invites all the boys up to his room, where he writes a letter to his relatives, telling them that the struggle is too great so he has decided to take poison and that they will find his skeleton in his bed. After the letter had been sealed and sent they get a skeleton and place it in the bed while their friend, who is supposed to have done away with himself, hides under the couch to await developments. Upon receiving the sad message the bereaved relatives hurry to the quarters of the supposed deceased, and there, as expected, they find what they think to be all that is left of their nephew. While they are giving way to their feelings, all the young man's creditors come upon the scene, and for the sake of honor the old uncle settles with every one and sends them away rejoicing over the young man's demise. When the last creditor is paid the youth is discovered under the couch and so pleased are the relations to have him alive that after a little scolding all is forgiven. Length, 535 feet.

PSYCHE.—This artistically colored picture, in a wonderful spectacular production, portrays an interesting story in mythology.

In the first scene we behold the pagan temple where the pretty maidens are making offerings of flowers to their gods. Suddenly Cupid appears and presents Psyche with the love dart, which arouses the jealousy of Venus, who complains to the gods and incurs their wrath against Psyche. Little Cupid intercedes but without success, and the gods summon Psyche before the tribunal and sentence her to everlasting solitude in a great cave. She accepts her punishment and goes to the cave accompanied by a coterie of maids who bid her a fond good-bye, and then leave her. Soon the tired creature falls asleep and the power of love comes to her assistance and she is carried away through the clouds to unknown lands where she is greeted by the three Graces who befriend her. She is then blindfolded and left alone. Cupid comes and consoles her, leading her to the beautiful palace where love conquers hatred and Venus is repelled and Psyche enters eternal paradise. Length, 934 feet.

THE BOGEY WOMAN.—The old bogey woman is an avowed enemy of all the children, for she has the power to change them into various vegetables, which she stores up in her cellar. One day while passing through the wood she comes upon two youngsters at play and immediately transforms them into a head of cabbage and a carrot, respectively. As she is carrying her burden home, a brother of the children, who has seen the transformation, hastens to give the alarm. The poor parents are distracted and give up hope of ever seeing their children again; but the little brother is visited by a fairy queen who gives him a wand and bids him go forth in search of the little ones. The youngster starts out and in his travels [illegible] with many obstacles but they are soon overcome under the power of the magic wand. Finally coming to a fountain he takes some of the magic waters which he takes with him to the home of the bogey woman. Entering the place he sees a large heap of vegetables on which he sprinkles some of the water; immediately there is a great transformation and a lot of romping children appear before him. The old bogey woman rushes in, but a few drops of water cause her to vanish into smoke and all the youngsters are liberated and return to their joyful parents. Length, 394 feet.

FUN WITH A MANIKIN.—A couple of art students suddenly discover that they are without enough money to buy themselves a meal, and being alone in a strange city, they are at their wits end trying to solve the difficult problem of getting some food without having to pay for it. Suddenly one of them hits upon a clever scheme and they proceed to try it. In the studio they have a manikin which they use as a model, so, after divesting the dummy of his classic robes, they dress him up in a conventional business suit and between the two they carry their inanimate friend away. Hailing a cab they enter and are driven to a cafe, where they alight and order the cabby to wait while they enter the place. The trio are given a seat at a table where the dummy is propped up. The fellows order a large meal, which is quickly served, and when finished they make their exit, telling the proprietor that their companion will settle the bill. The waiter present the check to the silent creature and when he gets no response he calls the proprietor, and the two grab the manikin and throw it out of the place. The cabby seeing his fare being treated so harshly, interferes and in turn gets a sound beating. When he discovers that the man is a dummy he drives away from the place vowing vengeance on the two jokers, who are in the background taking in the droll situation. Length, 587 feet.

BOOK-TAUGHT HYPNOTISM.—A funny young fellow reads an advertisement in the paper, stating that one can learn the art of hypnotism by buying and studying the rules prescribed in Dr. Wright's book. He goes to the office of the hypnotist and in a very short time demonstrates that he is a very apt scholar, for after being shown the trick, the first one who comes under his hypnotic influence is the old Doctor himself. Then as the maid enters the room the new pupil casts a spell over her and she stands rigid on the floor waiting directions from her hypnotizer. The fellow then directs the Doctor to pack up all the valuables in the room, and when they are nicely tied up he directs him to carry them out on the street. As the little procession is wending its way down the thoroughfare a policeman stops to inquire the nature of the strange proceedings, but before he has an opportunity to find out, he too is under the hypnotic influence. Then another officer comes along on horseback and after hypnotizing him also, the fellow mounts the rose and taking all the bundles he makes good his escape. The victims return to the station and when the other officers notice the strange conduct of the party they throw pails of water into their faces, which brings them out of their spells and they start out to catch the hypnotizer. Length, 315 feet.

AN INSPIRING SUNSET.—A picture of this kind is indeed a revelation of the heights that can be attained in clever photography; for we have accomplished the wonderful feat of reproducing a sunset as seen across the silent waters of the bay. The photography is wonderful, and the picture is inspiring, and inadequate of description, for one must see it in order to fully appreciate its artistic merits. Length, 289 feet.

DETERMINED WOOER.—A young fellow who is in love with a pretty girl has his troubles in wooing her, for he does not stand in high favor with the young lady's parents, who manage to catch the youth every time that he puts in his appearance. In order to get a glimpse of his lady love the ardent wooer tries all sorts of schemes to fool the old folks. First he disguises as a mail carrier, and enters the house with a letter which he presents to the old man and then, throwing off his disguise, he tries to make love to the girl, but is thrown out of the place. Finally, when they start out on a trip he is disguised as a ticket taker at the gate of the railway station, and when the party enter the train, the lover gets into the next compartment and keeps up a steady flirtation with the young lady. The old father, at last, becoming disgusted with the state of affairs, gives the determined wooer the girl with his blessing. Length, 390 feet.

BEN'S KID.—Buck Minor was the most detested man in Wolf Hollow, partly because he was quarrelsome and treacherous, partly because he abused and neglected his little wife, Molly, whom all the camp adored, and for whose sake it tolerated Buck.

A bright baby girl was Molly's only comfort and gave her courage to endure the hardships which otherwise must have crushed her.

The opening scene of the story shows a street in Wolf Hollow. Buck is on one of his usual rampages, and running into an athletic cowpuncher who is in town to spend his money, he makes an insulting remark and is soundly drubbed by the younger Hercules of the plains. Buck is proud of his fistic ability, and his defeat by a stranger before the denizens of the camp is more than he can stand, so he determines to pull up stakes and migrate to other parts. Stumbling along home to his cabin, he bursts into the one little room where his patient wife is rocking the little child to sleep, and with an angry growl informs her that he is going to "pull his freight" out of Wolf Hollow forever, and that she must accompany him, but leave the baby behind. Molly clasps the child wildly to her breast and begs piteously to be allowed to take her little one, but Buck is obdurate and gains his point by threatening to kill the infant unless she consents to leave it. Scrawling a note which he intends to leave, offering the child to anyone who may find it, he makes preparations for his immediate departure. Clinging wildly to her little one, the distracted mother is soon dragged from the house and told to mount one of the horses waiting without. Thus we see them riding away toward the setting sun, an inhuman father rejoicing in the prospects of shaking the dust of the hater camp from off his boots, a broken-hearted mother choking with sobs, thinking only of the helpless baby alone and deserted in the little cabin on the hill. Slippery Ann, a half-witted girl of the camp, meets Buck and his wife while on her return from a journey into the foothills, and is intrusted with the note Buck has written regarding the child. Hurrying on to Wolf Hollow, Ann turns the note over to Judge Honk, the father of the camp and dispenser of law and justice. The Judge is greatly exercised over the heartlessness of Buck, and calling the inhabitants of the camp about him, soon organizes a rescue party to repair to the deserted cabin of the Minors' and ascertains what truth there was in the strange letter. No time is lost in reaching the shack on the hill, and there, sure enough, lying on the bed is the infant. Taking it up rather gingerly in his arms, as though he were afraid of breaking it, Judge Honk heads the procession out the door and down the hill to the camp where a mass meeting is at once held to discuss ways and means of taking care of the kid. Cherokee Jim, the bartender of the "thirst emporium," suggests that they raffle off the youngster and whoever draws the winning card shall be the kid's adopted daddy. The raffle is quickly pulled off, and Ben Brooks, a good-natured, big-hearted cowpuncher, draws the lucky number. Ben almost re-nigs when he realizes what he has on his hands, but the cheers of good wishes of the rest of the bunch brace him up and they all retire to the "thirst parlor" to have one on the new daddy. After that "Ben's Kid" (as the baby is christened) becomes the one absorbing topic of conversation. Around the camp that night in the bunk house, a half-dozen sleepy punchers are trying to get some rest, while Ben in his bare feet is prancing around the room, jolting the baby up and down, while the youngster, terrified at its new surroundings, is making the welkin ring with its screams. "Fatty Carter," the heaviest weight on the range, does an Indian war dance, but to no avail. At last they all agree that the kid is sick, and a puncher is at once dispatched on the fastest bronco on the ranch to bring Judge Honk to the scene of battle at once (every one, of course, having absolute faith in the ability and knowledge of the Judge in all matters) to bring them out of the difficulty. The Judge soon arrives loaded down with mustard, and old-fashioned remedies of all kinds, and at once starts in to bring order out of chaos.

Now, to return to Buck and his heartbroken wife. All afternoon they have traveled until near nightfall. The horses are unsaddled, the pack removed from the lead animal, and preparations are made to camp till morning.

Now Molly has been turning over in her mind a plan, although a desperate one, it seems, the only loophole out of her present misery. Waiting until Buck has fallen into a sound slumber, she cautiously steals away from the camp fire and makes for a clump of trees in which are fettered the horses. Releasing her pony, she springs on his back and dashes away in the black night over the homeward trail. Aroused by the sound of her horses' hoofs, Buck awakes, and with a terrible oath upon realizing that Molly has outwitted him, goes crashing through the brush to his horse, and quickly saddling him, gallops away in pursuit of the fleeing woman, determined to overtake and kill her rather than let her escape from him for good. But he does not reckon on the swiftness of Molly's mount, and though he plies both whip and spur, his jaded horse is unable to gain a foot on the game little sorrel. On over rocks, through the stream, now down the slope of the mountainfi and across the gulch speeds the desperate woman, every nerve pounding on her brain, and every muscle strained to its utmost tension, her lips moving in silent prayer that she might outstrip the dread pursuer and regain the child for whom her mother's heart cries out in bitter anguish. At last, brave girl, the goal is reached. Her way leads past the ranch on which Ben Brooks and the U. X. outfit are quartered, and seeing a light in the bunk house, the terrified woman heads her horse toward the beacon ray of hope. She barely reaches the door when the infuriated husband dashes up, bursting into the room. Molly startles the boys and the Judge into action. Buck, losing his head beyond control, follows her. "Save me," shrieks the terrified Molly. In an instant Buck finds himself in the grasp of a dozen willing hands. With a strength born of frenzy, he dashes them aside and draws his gun to shoot the cowering girl, when his aim is spoiled by quick action on Ben's part, and the Judge gets the bullet in his arm. Howling with pain, he yells to the punchers to hang the "varmint." But Buck is too quick for them, and knocking down a couple of the boys, he rushes his way out the door, and throwing himself into the saddle, plunges away into the night. No time is lost in going after him. Twenty swift riders are in the saddle before ten minutes have elapsed and they are off after the hated Buck, whose horse, already worn out from the other chase, is soon overtaken. A lariat hurls through the air and settles down about his neck, thus ending all hopes of escape for the fugitive.

A letter written a year later to the Judge tells us what they did to Buck, while Molly, the pretty widow, is persuaded to let Ben retain his title to the kid by allowing Judge Houk to tie the knot, and Mr. and Mrs. Brooks start out on life's journey together, taking with them the good will and well wishes of the entire camp. WASHINGTON UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG.—George Washington was born in 1732, received a plain but practical education at the district schools and later at an academy, much of his learning, however, coming from the teachings of his older brother, who was educated in England.

We find the subject of our picture at the age of 16 on a surveying expedition with George William Fairfax. The day's work ended, the party of surveyors camp for the night. We see the Indians stealing upon them and Washington's early ability as a soldier is here testified to by putting the Indians to flight. At this period both the English and French were claiming lands in the Ohio Valley. The war spirit is manifest especially in Virginia and through the intervention of his brother. Washington received the appointment of Adjutant General and in this capacity is seen on a mission to the French, where he was received indifferently, presumably on account of his youthful appearance.

Preparations for war were begun and at the death of Colonel Frye the command of the regiment devolved on Washington. We find him at Fort Necessity, a palisade built of rough logs and probably named from the prevailing conditions of the time, endeavoring to repel an attack of the French. Being greatly outnumbered, he was forced to surrender at Great Meadows. Shortly after this Washington resigned his commission and returned to his mother's home at Mount Vernon. The acts of French hostility had aroused the attention of the British Minister and preparations for military operations in America were at once begun. General Edward Braddock being placed in charge of the forces in the Colonies. Reaching America, Braddock quickly learned of Washington's merits as a soldier and immediately invited him to join his staff. Despite the entreaties of his mother, Washington could not resist this plea to him and he immediately reported to Braddock at Alexandria. The march to Fort Duquesne, the present site of Pittsburg, was begun.

Washington's knowledge of the country and the mode of warfare, suggested to his superior the sending out of scouting parties. Braddock, however, would not listen and in consequence his men were shot down mercilessly, his forces completely routed and Braddock himself mortally wounded. After the death of Braddock Washington was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in the Colonies and after recovering from an illness he set out at once to capture Fort Duquesne. The French commander, finding himself outnumbered, waited until the English army was within a short distance of the fort, took his troops away during the night and set fire to the fort. The following day Washington marched up and planted the British flag on the ruins. The capture of Fort Duquesne practically terminated the military career of Washington as a British soldier.

Before starting on this last campaign Washington met the rich and charming widow, Mrs. Martha Custis, who was immediately smitten. He improved every opportunity to press his suit so, that before he left for Fort Duquesne they were engaged, the marriage to take place upon his return. The ceremony took place at the residence of the bride on January 6, 1759. Length, 990 feet.

WASHINGTON UNDER THE AMERICAN FLAG.—Passing over the intervening years between Washington's marriage in 1759 we come to the meeting of a General Congress, at Philadelphia, where the foundations were laid for our mighty nation. Congress assembled in Carpenter's Hall, where Patrick Henry made his famous speech, the keynote of American independence. The spirit of revolt against English oppression was growing in America, while in England the belief was that the appearance of an English army would surely subdue the Colonists.

Washington offered to accept the command of an army should occasion require it. Further and more stringent measures were adopted in Parliament and preparations for hostilities began at once. Military stores at Concord were destroyed, the battle of Lexington soon followed and by this time thoroughly aroused countrymen from all quarters hastened to Boston, the center of operations. This time Congress was in session at Philadelphia and Washington was there unanimously chosen General Commander of the Continental army. He set out at once from Philadelphia, arriving at Cambridge July 3, 1775, where he assumed command of the army. The battle of Bunker Hill meanwhile had been fought and thus proved to the British that their foe was more formidable than anticipated, their loss amounting to four times as many as that of the Colonists. Upon assuming command, Washington hastened to improve the weak points of the Colonies and as the terms of enlistment of his soldiers expired, Washington found his forces greatly depleted. The British, hoping quickly to subdue the Colonists, secured the Hessians to assist. They landed in the southern part of the country, whereupon Washington evacuated Boston and, engaging the enemy at various points on the march, crossed the Delaware in a blinding snowstorm, surprised the Hessians, under Rahl, and put them to rout. The whole Colonial force at this time was approximately five thousand men and, under promises of increased pay and bounties, these were kept together and new recruits added. Omitting the incidents during the intervening time, we find Washington at Valley Forge where he applied himself to forming new plans and cisterns for the army.

In a short time the raw recruits were developed into efficient soldiers, the stress of war was shifted to the south, Cornwallis brought his forces from North Carolina into Virginia. Washington concentrated his forces and, aided by the French ships in the mouth of the York River, succeeded in penning up Cornwallis and plans were laid for dealing a decisive blow. The memorable siege of Yorktown was begun and finally ended by the surrender of the British General. After eight years of war a treaty of peace was signed at Paris and the United States became free and independent, the army was discharged, Washington delivered his commission to Congress and retired to private life. Still he watched with solicitude the formation of a government and as a unanimous sentiment pronounced him the people's choice, he reluctantly accepted the office of President. The oath was administered by the Chancellor of the State of New York. Washington at once set about to properly organize the new government, the success of which is a matter of history. Upon the expiration of his second term, Washington retired to domestic life at Mount Vernon.

The closing scene pictures Washington at Mount Vernon directing servants in the fields and with his wife holding an informal reception. "The fame of Washington stands apart from every other in history. His name by all revered forms a universal tie of brotherhood."

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE.—Eve S. takes lunch to her father, who is working at Mr. Young's factory. By chance the young and handsome manufacturer sees her; he falls in love with her, and after a short talk tries to kiss her. Her father happens to see this; he gets very angry, and catching hold of Mr. Young he flings him to the floor. As might be imagined, Mr. Young will not stand this treatment from one of his men and turn him out.

Some months later we see S. in his plain but neat-looking home. He is working with an invention, which he believes will give him lots of money, but just now the family is very poor, and to procure the necessary money for food S. has to go to a pawnbroker with his best suit of clothes.

Eve is working hard all day with the sewing machine in order to procure a little money for the household.

She is interrupted at her work by a boy who brings a letter from Mr. Young asking her to meet him only for a few minutes. She cannot help granting him the request, as the handsome manufacturer has made a stronger impression on the young girl than she likes to confess.

A few minutes later the two young people take a walk together, and all scruples are forgotten. He kisses her again and again, and Eve does not make any objections, till at last she finds herself alone with several banknotes in her hand which Mr. Young has given her.

Later Mr. Young celebrates his betrothal with a rich and beautiful young lady. The festival is interrupted by S., who appears, using very strong language to Mr. Young, and flings his money right in his face. But the vulgar person is turned out, and the feast is continued.

S. soon after gets his invention sold and becomes a rich man. One day the little family learns that Mr. Young's factory is burned down, and the manufacturer totally ruined, through not having had the insurance policy duly renewed.

Eve had not been able to forget Mr. Young, and she now persuades her father to go to him and offer him partnership, but although the young man is ruined and left by everybody, even his intended bride, he is too proud to accept the noble offer, so that S. comes back without having accomplished his errand. But now Eve takes the matter in her own hands. She goes once more to the man she loves to propose partnership with her father, and this time Mr. Young has to submit, for Eve offers him not only her father's money, but her own honest heart and her hand as well.

CENTAUR FILM COMPANY.

THE CRYSTAL BALL: A Powerful Drama in which Mysterious Clairvoyant Power Prevents a Terrible Tragedy.—The first scene shows a number of convicts working in a quarry. The brutality of one of the guards causes one of the convicts to strike the guard and makes a desperate attempt to escape. After several exciting adventures the convict takes refuge in the home of Professor Brown.

The Professor has left his wife at home alone and he has gone to the home of a friend to meet some fellow scientists who have gathered to investigate the powers of the noted spiritualist "medium" Seera. This medium possesses a ball of pure crystal and he claims and proves that when he places his hands over the ball any person who gazes into the crystal will see a vision of some happening, past, present or future, in the life of a loved one. Professor Brown gazes into the ball and sees his wife bound to a chair, surrounded by the smoke and flames of a burning room.

The ball has given a vision of part of what has happened since Brown left his wife in their peaceful home. The convict has tied Mrs. Brown to a chair to prevent her from alarming the servants while he goes upstairs in search of clothes to take the place of his convict stripes. The brave woman makes her way into the adjoining library, and after knocking the receiver off with her teeth, she is about to telephone for assistance, when the convict enters and cuts the wire. On his way out the convict upsets the lamp, and the carpet and furniture take fire as he leaves the room. Entirely helpless, the poor woman is almost maddened with terror as she sees smoke, and later, flames, coming through the door. She struggles to release herself, but she cannot loosen the rope that binds her to the chair.

The Professor, in his friend's automobile, is seen dashing along the roads at a furious rate; but suddenly he comes to a stop, and the agonized husband is informed by the chauffeur that the machinery has broken. There is no other vehicle in sight. But Brown races off on foot, with but one thought—to save his wife.

Meanwhile, the prison guards in pursuit of the escaped convict have borrowed a buggy and are rapidly driving down the road, when they see their man and capture him.

Brown, running along, finds the buggy. In a moment he is driving at a tremendous speed toward his home. Here follow scenes that will thrill every man, woman and child, in every audience that sees this film. Scenes showing the wife making agonized attempts to release herself and escape from the approaching flames, are followed by others showing the Professor driving for life along country roads, then up the city boulevard, then alighting at his home from which smoke and flames are coming. He dashes into the house, through the rooms full of fire and smoke until he reaches the library. It is the work of only a few seconds to release his wife. But great danger now confronts the devoted pair. Seizing the table cloth and wrapping it around his wife's head, the Professor makes a quick dash through the burning rooms out into the fresh air, which quickly revives his wife. Kneeling down, the Professor and his wife give thanks to the Providence that has spared their lives.

THE RED MAN.—This story shows the open hospitality and unsuspecting honesty of the early pioneers. It also shows that singular gratitude of the Indian which was often displayed in those days.

The hunter leaving his humble cottage, accompanied by his little daughter, chances upon a wounded Indian, helps him to his home, and with his wife nurses him back to health and strength. During his convalescence the Indian and child become fast friends, the hunter realizing the unwavering loyalty of the red man, accepts him in his household.

A stranger, passing one day, asks for food which is cheerfully given; during the meal the hunter produces a small iron box in which he keeps his earnings and opens it in the presence of the stranger, preparatory to going to the village. The stranger watches him with avaricious eyes and notes where the box is kept. After satisfying himself of the hunter's departure, that night he sneaks back to the cabin, crawls through the window, and after stunning the sleeping Indian makes way with the box; soon after his departure the Indian recovers consciousness and discovering the theft, starts in pursuit, and clearly demonstrates the red man as being a veritable bloodhound in following a trail. After a long, hard chase through the woods the thief discovers he is fast being overtaken, and coming upon a bridge, he leaps from the banister and alights upon the rocks below, where his body is discovered by the Indian, who then proceeds to carry him to the home of the hunter, who, having arrived home in the meantime, and being apprised of what has happened during his absence, was starting in pursuit.

The hunter, grasping the situation at once, realizes to what extremes the red men will go in expressing their gratitude for kindness received, takes the hand of the Indian and vows his everlasting friendship to one so prompt in the defense of his home and loved ones.

The scenery in this picture, without a doubt, is something that cannot help but be admired by everyone; the picture being taken in the woods, on the banks of the Columbia River, which is world-famed for its beauty. Length, 750 feet.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph 1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

EPISODE OF THE CUBAN WAR

A WAR DRAMA

(Powhatan)

The short annals of our military occupation of Cuba brought into our national traditions, new romances, new pulsations, new springs of imagination and the Episode here related is but a glimpse into the rich field, showing the elemental temperaments of that hot blooded race to the south of us.

Picturesquely and stirringly is told the swift and tragic self-sacrifice of a dancing girl as she saves an American Officer from the deadly vengeance of her former native lover.

Photographically this work is beautiful and of a high grade in technique.

A PAINFUL JOKE—(Comerio)

A rich comedy, with superb settings and high art photography is given in the above production of Comerio, and we can vouch for a popular response. As good comedy is seldom realized, and the demand is always great for it.

Refreshing always, are the practical jests of youthful jokers, and we here have a crisp and entertaining bit of humor, from sunny Italy, as good for Americans as for Europeans, as real clever comedy is international in scope.

A True Indian's Heart

This film is without question the best of its kind ever produced in America.

The story relates to an Indian who is attached to a family, consisting of a Colonel, his wife, daughter and little boy. A Mexican who is in love with the daughter is repulsed by her, and he avenges himself by taking her baby brother, and then writes "I will return the child only for you". The kind hearted Indian is then informed of what has happened, and immediately goes on the trail.

We next see the Mexican leaving on horse with child riding at break neck speed, followed closely by the Indian. Arriving at the river bank he dismounts horse, finding two canoes enters one and sinks the other. The Indian, however, raises canoe and follows in pursuit. In this scene we see one of the most thrilling canoe chases ever shown in moving pictures. The Indian succeeds in over taking the Mexican, and we see a struggle in the water, in which the Indian conquers the Mexican whom he drowns. Then after taking the child from the villian we see the Indian still in pursuit of the accomplice.

This film has many more beautiful scenes, too numerous to mention, and we can only add that the characters are the best actors in America, and the scenes the most beautiful nature has produced.
